Wm. Harris returned Saturday from a business trip to Iowa.

Edwin Cook is making a profit on rats bagas by feeding cattle on them.

Although the prospect last spring for a corn crop were discouraging, that which did get a start has given a good yield. Corn has been a good crop for four years. The fodder alone pays for the raising.

I should like to know how many JOURNAL correspondents are happy over the election news.

Ed. Stafford is foreman in the woods for Nash.

The Wells boys have gone to Cheboygan to work this winter in the lumber woods.

If the Advance correspondent is bald on account of domestic trouble I would advise him to settle it in some way, or he will soon have no head to get bald, if his troubles end as domestic troubles usually do.

Wilson.

Cold and rainy.

Joseph Sutton's baby is quite ill.

Mrs. Hudkins is still on the sick list.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Batchelor, of Boyne City, was seen on our streets on Tuesday last.

We understand that Andrew Now land has bought part of M. Hudkins' farm and will soon move up.

J. R. Vance goes today (Tuesday) to Sheboygan, Wis., on the schooner Sardinia, to make arrangements for lumber business for the coming season.

The girls of this vicinity are now seen daily roaming the forests in search of beechnuts and they are well rewarded for their trouble.

Ed Nowland and family, Sam and Philo Nowland also Will Warden attended a dinner party at A. Nowland's at Boyne Falls on Sunday, the occasion being Miss Annie's 18th birthday.

Glad the investigation in regard to the court-house fire, so long pending has culminated, and hope no guilty one will escape, and that the "county-seat steal" will receive a little attention also.

Mr. David Ruch, of Greenville, is now cutting logs for F. L. Smith. His sawing is done by way is a cousin of Mrs. Smith and Geo. Bowen—will come north in a few weeks to spend the winter.

Eld. H. C. Seofield, J. R. Vance, and families, attended church at Pleasant Valley on Sunday afternoon. Eld. Burdge was not present, but F. M. Chase, late of the Citizen, read from Luke, 4th chapter, and made a few appropriate remarks.

Eveline.

Nov. 12.—R. E. Newville, of Boyne City, was in town Saturday.

Mrs. John Dunlop, we are pleased to note, is on the gain.

Isaac Waldron, who was recently burned out at Ironton, has already commenced to build. He has the frame up.

Peter now occupies E. G. Jarman's house.

Mr. Warner, of near Topeka, Kan., nephew of D. N. Gregory, is here on a visit to his uncle.

A boss time is reported at the dance at Dave Snyder's, last Friday evening.

The Jarman brothers are fishing with nets, with very good success.

W. H. Jarman visited with relatives in Petoskey last week.

The furnace was shut down last week for a few days, for want of coal.

Stillman Parker has his house about completed. He has painted it with an olive color, trimmed with a dark red. It is one of the finest farm residences in this section.

W. A. Stanley arrived home from Petoskey with an ox team. Will now has two ox teams, and it looks as though he meant business.

Samuel Bigelow of East Jordan, was in town on Monday.

Owen Wood has begun cutting saw logs and cord wood for Guyles & Nash.

Burgess.

Two rainy days this week, which made everyone glad, as water was getting very low, even in the wells.

A road bee on the quarter line road Thursday of this week.

Mr. Clover lost a fat hog out of a pen one night last week. The bear, or whatever else took it, came when there were no men around, or he might not have got off so slick.

It is reported that Mr. Orlowskie also lost half of a hog that he had left hung up over night.

Pork seems to be on the rise.

CLUB RATES.

To accommodate those of our subscribers who do not have a city paper, and who will miss the general news features heretofore found on our weekly price pages, we will take subscriptions for the JOURNAL and the Detroit Weekly Free Press, until January 1, 1890, at $1.60 per year, Cash in advance.

This is really much cheaper to the subscriber than the eight page JOURNAL was at $1.50, as the Weekly Free Press contains 12 large pages of small type, giving all the news of the state, besides a complete synopsis of the principal domestic and foreign events of the week, and the best stories and miscellany ever published.

At this club rate all subscriptions MUST be paid in Advance is Cash.

In our issue of Nov. 21 we shall print an "Order" entitling the holder to a pattern (free) of the above basque, in sizes for 34, 36, 38, or 40 inches in bust measure. A pattern of this stylish garment is very useful to any lady, as by simply leaving off the revers a plain basque is obtained, which is always desirable; and it is just such a pattern as every lady should have in the house.

We have made arrangements with a New York house to furnish these patterns in the different sizes as above, so that the holder of the "Pattern Order" may have the size she may desire. This is a great offer, as each pattern has a full value of 25 cents being accompanied by an illustration, and explicit directions for putting together and making.

LADIES not fail to buy our issue of Nov. 21, and cut out the "Pattern Order," which will entitle you to this excellent pattern, FREE.

Children on Marriage.

Children are the keenest of observers and the most practical deducers; indeed, their deductions are often more astonishing than agreeable to their elders. Though we laugh, we do not always enjoy having our weakness revealed or us by the babbling of babes.

Six little children were at play, and whether it was that they grew tired of familiar games or that that innate principle, "It is not good for man to be alone," crawed expression, they determined to have a wedding. John, aged 8, should marry Hattie, aged 5, and Brother Harry would speak "the words that bind."

Now, Harry had never heard a marriage ceremony and was entirely ignorant of the prevalent pledges, but was he at a loss? Not he. He knew what papa and mamma considered of paramount virtue, and surely what they each so eagerly desired must constitute the requisite of a happy married life.

The candidates for wedlock were requested to stand side by side and gravely obeyed.

"Harry, will you get up in the morning and see that John has his breakfast in time and that he has good things to eat and lover has to wait for his meals?"

"John, will you give her all the money she wants?"

That was all, but does it not contain the quintessence of married felicity?—Kansas City Star.

Watered Milk.

The milkman who waters his goods generally does so under the impression that the water poured in incorporates itself with the milk and cannot be detected except upon chemical analysis. This shows gross ignorance. The milk will hold only its own fluid; all foreign fluid will be precipitated if the mixture is allowed to stand for a couple of days. Any housewife may spot a dishonest milkman with very little trouble. Let her take a long slender bottle, cleanse it thoroughly and let it dry out. If, then, it is filled with milk and allowed to stand in a cool—not cold—place for forty-eight hours, all the foreign fluid will be precipitated—that is, it will settle to the bottom of the bottle. The soured milk will then fill the middle of the bottle and the fatty substance will be floating on top. Sometimes the top will be a layer of cream, then will come a layer of albumen, another artificial device to make the milk look rich. There will come the soured milk and at the bottom will be the foreign water. The whole scheme of deception can be read by a glance at the bottle after one has had a single lesson in the rudiments of milk inspection. This sort of work is not scientifically satisfactory, but it will always develop the fundamental fact—whether or not the milk is normal.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Joke on the Dog.

Last Saturday afternoon an old, gray haired gentleman appeared in Jackson park. He was accompanied by a small lump dog of the pug species. This dog ran about in an aimless way which indicated that he did not have any more sense than a stamped envelope. He traveled over the flower beds and left his footprints among the plants, and he had his own way until a park policeman caught sight of him. Finding out who was the owner of the dog the policeman approached the old gentleman, tapped him on the shoulder and said: "See, here, my friend, you must have that dog keep away from the flowers. Don't you see that sign reading: 'Dogs not allowed on the grass?' The old gentleman chuckled, jerked his thumb toward the dog, and replied: "Yes, I see it, but that little cuss can't read." He thought it was a good joke on the dog, and he refused to think otherwise until the policeman threatened to lock him up if he did not call off the dog, which he did.—Chicago Herald.

School Teachers.

If every new girl who is introduced as a school teacher should be "dropped" by the beaux when she proves to be a failure, we would soon have no teachers, or good ones at least. It is strange, but a fact, that, as usual, the girls who, for from two to three years, seem utterly hopeless, finally become the best in the staff, while, on the other hand, those who start out most promising, too often become worthless. While the Normal school lays a good foundation, it does not finish a teacher—in fact, "making a teacher" only commences when she makes her debut in the school room. The superintendent's staff and her principal watch, instruct and discipline her for about four years, when she is a thorough, reliable teacher, and then—she goes off and marries, generally.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A "Suspended Judgment."

The true scientific attitude of the day, as expressed by the president of the British association, Professor Fowler, is a "suspended judgment." Professor Fowler indorses Sir John Lubbock's idea that the field of inquiry is limitless and that there may be "fifty other senses as different from ours as sound is from sight, and even within the boundaries of our own senses there may be endless sounds which we cannot hear and colors as different as red from green of which we have no conception. These and a thousand other questions remain for solution. The familiar world which surrounds us may be a totally different place to other animals. To them it may be full of music which we cannot hear, of color which we cannot see, of relations of which we cannot conceive."—Science Gossip.

All Reverence the Dead.

A day or two ago a fruit peddler was passing up Elizabeth street east, yelling "ba-nan-nes" at the top of his voice, when he suddenly caught sight of the crape on a door which signified that a child lay dead in the house.

"Ba-nan-nes! Ba-nan-nes! Sa"——!

He checked his words as he saw the crape, removed his hat and placed it on his cart, and he walked to the next square barefaced and silent.—Detroit Free Press.

Baggage Master Preferred to President.

When President Harrison was returning from his Bar Harbor visit and his special car was attached to the Washington express of the Pennsylvania railroad the conductor went into the presidential car.

"Mr. President, I have a favor to ask of you," said the conductor.

"Well, what is it?" said the president, with the old, weary, anti-office seeker look on his face.

"I want you to let me bring in my little boy Harry, who is on the train, and introduce him."

The chief magistrate's face brightened instantly, and he replied: "Bring him in by all means."

The boy, a bright little fellow of about 11 years, was brought into the private car and duly introduced. The president put his arm affectionately about the boy, and, drawing him to him, said:

"Now, Harry, you must sit right down and ride the rest of the way to Washington with me."

Harry didn't exactly know how to receive this proposition at first, and then, looking up into the president's face, he said innocently, in his childish treble:

"I'd rather ride with the baggage master."

As the child left the car the president remarked:

"That's the first time since I've been in office that a baggage master's company has been preferred to mine."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

An Old Skipper's Tough Yarn.

Down in South street the other day they were talking about a schooner which had been struck by lightning, when the reporter singled out an old mariner and said:

"Capt. H——, it seems to me I've read or heard of your brig being struck."

"Yes, she was," answered the old yarn spinner.

"Where was it?"

"Off Point Aux Barques, about fifteen years ago. Very strange case that. Probably the only one of the kind ever heard of."

"Give us the particulars."

"Well, we were jogging along down when a thunderstorm overtook us, and the very first flash of lightning struck the deck amidships and bored a hole as big as my leg right down through the bottom of the vessel."

"And she foundered, of course."

"No, sir. The water began rushing in, and she would have foundered, but there came a second flash and a bolt struck my fore-to-gallant mast. It was cut off near the top, turned bottom end up, and as it came down it entered the hole and plugged it up as tight as a drum. When we got down to dry dock we simply sawed off either end and left the plug in the planks."—Philadelphia Republic.

Possible, but Not Advisable.

Some men are always positive, with little or no reason, while others err on the other side, and are never certain of anything. Gen. Knox, Washington's first secretary of war, who lived and died at Thomaston, Me., had a "general problem" named Gleason, who was commonly supposed to know more about Knox's affairs than did Knox himself. He was obscurious in his style of speech and could never say no—a weakness of which the general once in a while made game.

On one occasion Knox was passing a new three-story house, which was one of several he had lately completed, when he took it into his head to see whether he could get a decided negative out of his useful superintendent.

"Gleason," said he, "don't you think the chimneys in this house—they are all finished and topped out—could be removed without being taken down, and put into that house yonder? Suppose we go thither in a less forward state nearly half a mile away."

"Yes, sir," said Gleason, as usual.

Then in a moment he perceived the absurdity of his answer and added:

"Yes, sir, it might be done, but it would injure the buildings."—Youths' Companion.

Bill Nye's Picture.

The scrap book which "Carl Pretzel" takes a pride in is rich in autographs of "good people." Away back in 1885, when Bill Nye was editing The Boomerang, at Laramie, Wy. Ter., he sent "Pretzel" his photograph, and this is what he wrote along with it: "My Dear Pretzel—I send you a very good Broad Panel by this mail, which, if you will instruct the artist to thicken up the neck a little and tone down the turkey gobbler knob on the trachea, will make a noble picture. As to the body of course, I am not so voluptuous as you are, but George Peck's enthusiasm would not be far out of the way. I like to get a picture in which I can borrow another man's clothes, and, if possible, a $1.00 diamond, as it gives an air of grandeur, opulence and terror that is good to see. I hope, too, that I shall also have the Canucian instincts to acknowledge the picture in such a way that it will do you some good."—Chicago Herald.

Coffin and Gravestone.

Miss. Bernhardt has disposed of the coffin she had bought against the time of her burial, says The Paris Gaulois. But the original Sarah has been eclipsed in the matter of anticipatory dealings with the undertakers. In the burying ground attached to a certain pretty church there is to be seen a curious object in the shape of a large black coffin-stone, just on an unoccupied grave. It is the property of an eccentric lady, who wishes all the arrangements for her funeral to be conducted in strict accordance with her own views. To this end she has already settled many preliminaries, including not only the purchase of the grave she is to rest in, but also of the stone which is to cover her, and here it lies already in position and only waiting the final inscription. At present only the initials of the proud owner are given on the foot. The lady in question is still in the prime of life and in redundant health.

Our Country's Future.
Or Great National Questions, is the title of Mr. Habberton's new book, treating of some of the more important social, political and business questions of the day. The work embodies the opinions of more than one hundred of our national leaders, and is, at this crisis, of much more than ordinary interest. Not only in what he has written, but also in bringing together the opinions of such eminent men as Bishop Foss, President Harrison, Ex-President Cleveland, Cardinal Gibbons, Dr. Wayland Hoyt, Talmage, Conwell, Bishop Potter, Pawnetty and others, concerning these vital topics of the day Mr. Habberton has done the public a good service. We understand that the book is to treat of marriage, divorce, the rum power, labor, anarchism, our coast defences, speculation, sorrows of the city poor and other topics that would naturally have a bearing on the present and future prosperity of our people.
This volume will give to the reader a vast fund of information on all these subjects that are so frequently coming up in the newspapers and periodicals; and the man who reads it understandingly, will find himself well informed on all these important questions of the day. Not only this, but he will have his information from the most reliable source. The authorities quoted are eminent in Church and State, they have devoted years to the study of these subjects, and their opinions and notes of warning should be carefully read and heeded by all who are interested in the continued prosperity and stability of our country. We know of no other book that will contain so much late reliable information on these topics.
Mr. Habberton is a popular writer and bright journalist, and, all in all, this volume will be found exceedingly interesting and suggestive. Sold only by subscription.

Demorest's Magazine.
We had never fully comprehended what was meant by a "Family" magazine, until we had given the fine Christmas number of Demorest's Family Magazine a thorough examination. Of all others, this Magazine is certainly best entitled to use the word "Family" in its title,—for every member is considered in its make-up. Its beautifully illustrated articles are equal to any in the high-class literary magazines. Especially noticeable in the December number is one about "Uncle Sam's Money," giving a description of how our coin is made, the illustrations starting with a view of the Mint, and going through every process until the coin is put in circulation. The "Day Nurseries" takes us among the worthy poor, and shows us what can be done for their little ones. Every father and mother will appreciate this comprehensively and finely illustrated article. The other illustrated articles and stories are too numerous to mention, as our be appreciated when we say that the December number contains over two hundred illustrations, and every member of the family is thought of. But though our space is limited, we must mention the beautiful oil picture, "Christmas Morning," which is indeed worthy of a frame. We would advise everybody to at least see this Family Magazine before making their choice for next year. They can obtain it from any newsdealer, or can for only $2.00 per year, and certainly the claim is a just one. Published by W. Jennings Demorest, 15 East 14th St. New York.

Are You Getting What You Voted For?

Correspondence Ithaca Herald.

EDITOR HERALD:—During the political campaign last fall the Republican speakers and newspapers informed the farmers that if Harrison was elected, and protection insured as the settled policy of the nation, farmers would share in the general prosperity; farm produce would advance in price, as a home market would be established etc. These sentiments were loudly applauded, and to-day farmers are dancing to the music. One year ago wheat was worth about one dollar a bushel; now it is worth from fifty to seventy two cents. Oats were worth twenty five cents; now they are from twenty cents. Hogs were worth five dollars per cwt., alive; now they are worth three and one-half. On the other hand, we have been paying a tax or bonus from two to three cents per pound on sugar, and other goods accordingly.

One of my neighbors who last week returned from a visit in Canada, told me that wheat there was worth ninety cents per bushel, oats thirty, and hogs five dollars per cwt., alive.

I own a good farm of eighty acres, sixty acres improved and into crops. I have worked hard all summer about thirteen hours a day, and have raised very good crops. When I estimate the value of my farm, team, implements, etc., at seven per cent., I find that I have not got over twenty cents a day over the interest, for my hard labor and I have done fully as well as my neighbors.

Farmers voted for protection so that the man that makes his clothing, tools and implements can make from three to five dollars a day—and himself twenty five cents. Surely farmers are the most liberal class of men in the world. Now, farmers, before you call the writer of this article a "fool" and a "crank", take your pencil and figure all your farm property at seven per cent. and see if you get over twenty five cents a day for your hard labor. Talk about "cheap pauper labor in Europe." Show me a country in the civilized world where they pay such starvation wages as is paid to the poor deluded dupes of the monopolist, called farmers.

Since the incoming of the present administration an immense amount of American property has been bought by British capitalists. Breweries, mines, tanneries, grain elevators, manufacturing establishments, and even "Warner's Safe Cure." Through the aid of such men as Bright, Chamberlain and Gladstone, the common people of Great Britain have thrown off the yoke of greedy capitalists who have so long taxed them to poverty. After locking all over the earth for an investment for their capital, the British capitalists saw that the laboring classes here voted for a tax of over forty per cent. on the necessaries of life. As no other people on earth were simple enough to vote such robbery on themselves, the British capitalists hurriedly bought up all the property they could get, as they would have a chance to form trusts and syndicates and rob the people to their hearts content. Our forefathers would not pay a tax of two cents a pound on tea, but we pay her lords a tax of from twenty to eighty per cent. on the necessaries of life. It would seem as if our home purchase is all that is necessary for England to own this country again. That is for her to buy the Detroit and New York Tribune and the other leading Republican papers; for whatever these papers say, however absurd it may be the people believe. The farmers actually believed when these papers said "The tariff is not a tax," and that "the election of Harrison would insure a home market and raise the price of grain and stock." But, Mr. Editor as it takes a bushel of oats to buy two pounds of sugar, and as we are offered one and one-half cents per pound for good fat steers, we wonder, at the same rate of increase since last year, how long the "home market" will be in reaching us. I cannot understand how so many farmers who are "Patrons of Industry" would be shut out competition and give the manufacturers a bonus of over forty per cent. now whine about trusts and bind the retail merchant to a profit of ten per cent.

I hope the farmers who voted for the present state of affairs are well pleased; if they are not, perhaps they will be at the end of the administration. The price of grain and stock has gone down: goods have gone up, interest has advanced, trusts have multiplied. And the end is not yet.

Eveline.

Nov. 19.—Chas. Graham is home again from Beach's camp, near Boyne.

There has been some sickness among our school teachers the past ten days. Clinton B. Lane, teacher in the Hillegas district, Miss Florence Price in the Beers' district, and Miss Addie Lewis at Advance have all been very sick. We understand Miss Price is still sick.

We for one, brother Inwood, rejoice over the election news. The democrats do get there occasionally.

No, there is nothing the matter with the democrats, Bro. Boyne.

At this writing we hear that the infant child of Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Brown is not expected to live.

Uncle Dan McLoud and another man from Charlevoix, are here at work for the Jarman brothers.

As the teachers of this county have been requested to send in their school reports to the JOURNAL, the teachers of Eveline should bear this in mind. Remember, teachers, that reports published in a paper encourages the pupils. So let us see a full report.

F. E. Miller of this place, is selling off his farming implements, household goods, etc., and is making preparations to remove his family to Kansas City, where he will remain. We understand he has sold his place to James Ingalls. East Jordan, patentee of the Ingalls churn, for the right of selling the Ingalls churn in the states of Kansas, Missouri, Iowa and part of Nebraska. He will be engaged in selling territories. Good luck to Fred.

Henry Cooper, of Charlevoix, was in town Tuesday, collecting.

Mrs. E. Jackson is on the sick list.

J. G. Peterson's new store building at Ironton is so far completed that he will commence moving in today. It is a two-story building, 22x36. The family will occupy the upper story. Mr. and Mrs. Peterson desire us to extend a cordial invitation to their friends to meet them at the new store on Saturday evening of this week. Peanuts, candy, and cigars will be served free, and men, women and children are invited to come and have a good time.

Mr. Gus Case of East Jordan, and Miss Ella Thorp, of Ironton, were married at Boyne City on Thursday, Nov. 14, 1889. Congratulations.

News reached here last week that Dan McDonald, well known here, was married at Nashtenaw, Mackinaw county. We wish the happy couple much joy.

Report of school, district No. 3, Eveline, for the month ending Nov. 15: Number of pupils enrolled, 12. Average daily attendance, 9. The names of those that were neither tardy nor absent, are Katie McDonald, Emma Henry, Olive Tuttle, Ivy Gregory, Ethel Gregory.

MARY JOHNSON, teacher.

Boyne City.

Nov. 18.—Fine Weather,

Bert Melosh was released from custody; the Prosecuting Attorney deeming the evidence against him insufficient to warrant holding him. L. N. Melosh is held in lien of $500 bail.

N. J. DeBar has moved into the Sanderson house, which he lately purchased.

Matt Cunningham has moved into his new residence, and when settled will have one of the coziest and most comfortable homes in Boyne City. The design is his own and does credit to his ideas of home comfort.

Last Sunday morning at one o'clock E. H. Shepherd was arrested by the Deputy Sheriff for criminal libel, as we understand on affidavit of G. W. White, stating damaging reports made by Mr. Shepherd against some of our citizens with regard to the court house fire. The better part of the citizens of Boyne (and as we are informed of East Jordan also) were very indignant over the affair; and a number of our responsible citizens were arranging to bail Mr. Shepherd, but he was released early Monday morning on his own recognizance.

Inwood.

O. D. Hilton has plowed 45 acres this fall.

Mrs. Hilton visited friends in Ironton two days last week.

Mrs. Max Genett is on the sick list.

The McGeagh school will not resume until the winter term.

David Prosser has a new wood sawing machine.

Ed Cook and Harry Hilton have gone to Cheboygan to work for the winter.

Business seems to be good at Norwood, everybody busy.

Max Genett is preparing to build a large barn.

Mr. Parsons, an Antrim county farmer, has just returned from a visit to Wisconsin, and reports that farmers there are sowing salt on their wheat ground, 100 pounds to the acre, with good results.

Alfred VanDensen killed two pigs 179 days old that dressed 191 and 194 pounds respectively, and he wants to know who can beat it.

A B. Meech is Nash's book-keeper at the little mill.

Mrs. James Cook and her brother were both sick with sore throat last week, but are now better.

O. D. Hilton is preparing to build a large straw barn to run his straw into when he threshes, so as to save re-handling.

O. D. Hilton, director, has offered two prizes for spelling to the pupils of his district, to be awarded next April 15th. The names will be reported to the JOURNAL at that time.

Wilson.

Lovely Indian summer.

Sunday school rather slim on Sunday last.

Will and Judson Wing were seen on our streets on Sunday.

School began this (Tuesday) morning with Miss Katie Wilson of Banks as teacher.

Elder Scofield preached at Collins, near Deer Lake, on Sunday last.

Mrs. Geo. Bowen had a bad spell with her heart, one day last week, but is better at present.

We understand that Mr. H. Preble has adopted two children,—a boy and a girl. They came from near Vanderbilt.

Mr. J. R. Vance and family, also the Misses Scofield, visited the Jones cemetery near South Arm on Sunday afternoon.

Joseph Lewis of Lapeer county, is making his annual visit to his parents, and he is anxiously waiting for snow to have a deer hunt.

Jason Lewis celebrated his thirty-third birthday one day last week, all of the family being present,—the first time on such an occasion for several years.

M. Hulkins has his conservatory finished. Mr. Case has a new wood shed at the Will Howard place. Robert Shepherd has his new barn in running order.

Advance.

Nov. 19.—Shall we have an open winter, or a hard one? Where are the weather prophets?

Mr. F. E. Miller has sold his farm and will go soon to Kansas City, Mo., where he intends to locate.

Miss Florence Price had to adjourn her school in the Beers district on account of sickness.

The schooner Julia Larson from Detroit is at this place. Her captain is buying potatoes and selling apples and cider.

Mr. C. G. VonPlaten has been building an addition to his house.

A party last Friday night at Tom Morrison's. About thirty people present, and an enjoyable time is reported.

The township clerks and school inspectors of the towns of Wilson and Eveline, met at A. B. Steele's last Saturday and decided upon the merits of a dispute between districts Nos. 1 and 6. The decision was favorable to district No. 1.

Wonder if the earthquake that shook up Iowa and Ohio will visit Michigan next fall? It would be just like the democrats to elect the next governor of Michigan.

Burgess.

Loren Hamlin is finishing off the inside of his house.

Horace Newsome went to Grand Rapids last Thursday.

Fred Smith took his wife to Petoskey last Saturday for medical treatment.

Mrs. Kane expects her brother Mr. Chas. Long of Lansing on a visit the last of the week.

Quite a number went from Undine Tuesday to Boyne City to attend circuit court.

Most everyone has got their fall plowing done and we are now waiting for snow.

Quite a curiosity at John Brown's; last winter he had a well drove at his place to the depth of 172 feet and got no water. But ever since just before a storm it commences to blow off and can be heard at the distance of several yards, and close to the pipe it sounds like bubling water. Can any one tell the cause of it?

Barnard.

Nov. 20.—Farmers are busy preparing for winter.

Prof. Cox organized a singing school here last Thursday evening.

Mrs. Wm. Clark is able to be about the house again.

Mrs. Beattie moved to Charlevoix Tuesday and will occupy her residence on the south terrace.

Mr. Pickern of Ontario is visiting his sister, Mrs. John Oldham.

William Graham raises a large frame barn on Thursday.

Wm. Clark is putting up an icehouse.

Homer Clark started for the lumber woods at Cheboygan, last Monday.

Norwood.

N. A Shores has returned home from deer hunting, and venison is plenty here now.

John Muirhead went to Petoskey Monday morning to meet Mrs. Muirhead who has been visiting friends in Battle Creek.

The Norwood cornet band will give a dance and supper Thanksgiving night. Everybody invited.

Frank Richardson has returned home from Lowell, Mass., and says everything is booming down east.

Ben Pearl, who has been laid up with a lame arm is again able to work.

Fortitude Born of Love.

It was in the year 1880, in a third rate city called Neufchateau, in the department des Vosges, France, about noon, that we were passing, my father and myself, in front of a store where in addition to hardware a supply of ammunition was kept for the use of a regiment there. Suddenly we heard a terrible explosion, and being either thrown or having unconsciously ran, I know not which, we at any rate found ourselves about twenty yards from where the explosion occurred, and could see part of the roof in the street.

We had hardly reached the building when a man came out of it covered with powder, his hair and beard burning, and large pieces of flesh hanging from his face and bare arms. Never will I forget the horror of the sight, his flesh was charred and his clothes partly burning. As he reached the sidewalk he looked around and called a name I did not catch. Receiving no answer he went right back into that burning furnace, and in a few seconds came out backing in his arms his child, a girl of 6 or 7. Those nearer to him heard him say:

"My darling, are you hurt? Oh, you are hurt!" While the poor little thing kept saying: "No, papa, I am not hurt, not at all; you are burning, think of yourself," and yet the blood was trickling from her forehead where the flying debris made a deep gash. Both recovered, though disfigured for life. At the time I thought there was not only one hero, but two.—Cor. Philadelphia Press.

About the Chinese.

Mrs. Emerson says that while the Japanese are becoming more civilized daily the Chinese are in the same old spot, and worse, if anything. "I believe it is due to the government," she remarked. "It looks with distrust upon all new methods proposed by Europeans and Americans. I lived one winter at Peking."

"How do you spell that?"

"Why, Peking, of course. It is often spelled Pekin in the United States, but nowhere else. In olden times China had two capitals, Nanking and Peking. Ing is the Chinese word denoting capital. To distinguish between the two cities the northern capital was called Nanking and the southern one Peking. So the correct word is Peking."—Chicago Times.

The Original Star Route.

The Jupiter and Lake Worth railroad very properly claims the prior privilege of using the designation "Star Route." According to The Railway Age, the stations on that short line are named Jupiter, Venus, Mars, Juno.—Philadelphia Times.

A Scrap of Paper Saves Her Life.

It was just an enclosure in a scrap of paper, but it saved her life. She was in the last stages of consumption, told by her physicians that she was incurable and could live only a short time, she weighed less than seventy pounds. On a piece of wrapping paper she read Dr. King's New discovery, and got a sample bottle; it helped her, she bought a large bottle, it helped her more, bought another, and grew better fast, continued its use and is now strong, healthy, rosy, plump, weighing 140 pounds. For further particulars send stamp to W. H. cole, druggist, fort Scott. Trial bottles of this wonderful discovery free at F. G. Hines & Co's drug store.

THE NEW YORK STAR.

A Daily and Weekly Newspaper.

PROSPECTUS FOR 1889.

THE STAR BUILDING.

THE NEW YORK STAR passed into the hands of new managers in November last, and a new corporation is now in full possession and control of it.

During the first months of the change the improvement made in it was so pronounced that it came to be recognized at once as

A Live, Bright and Brilliant Newspaper.

Its news columns are filled with the freshest of foreign, domestic and local news. Its editorials are crisp, positive and bold. Its Democratic principles are so pronounced and orthodox that the Democratic National Committee, on its recent reorganization, selected it as the medium for placing its official action and utterances before the voters of the party. It urges united Democracy in nation, State and city; and is the advocate of no individual or the organ of no faction.

ITS SUNDAY ISSUE OF 16 PAGES

is regarded universally as the best combination of original literature with news which is now published in New York city on Sunday. The matter selected for the literary columns is supplied by scores of contributors of the highest merit and reputation. Their united contributions each Sunday would make a volume large as Harper's Magazine, and treating of many more subjects than any monthly magazine published ever discusses. The whole at a cost of only 5 cents for 16 pages!

THE WEEKLY EDITION

differs in many respects from the weekly editions of other New York papers. It is a condensed edition of the really important news of the week carefully condensed and systematically arranged. All the markets of interest to farmers are published in detail; space is given to the class of literature most welcome in the home circle. Special care is taken to interest the women of the household. It does not pretend to instruct the farmer in farming, but to interest him in the general news of the world, leaving the home paper of each subscriber to supply the practical information on all agricultural topics. It is an excellent paper, therefore, to obtain, through favorable club rates, along with the weekly printed in your immediate locality.

TERMS.

For the six months from July 1 to Dec. 31, 1889, we offer THE STAR, free of postage to any part of the United States and Canada, outside the limits of New York city:

Every day, six months	$3.50
Daily, without Sunday, six months	3.00
Sunday edition, six months	75
WEEKLY STAR, six months	50

Try it for one-half year and you will not be content ever after to be without either the daily, Sunday or weekly issue.

The terms for a year's subscription are just double those given above as the rates for the next six months.

A $20 A Day Man!

A VOICE from Ohio. Here is a man who is a native of Ohio, who writes from his farm, Ohio, that he can make $20 a day easily with our goods. Another writes from Illinois that he made $20 in one day. A lady writes from Ky. that she made $20 in a day. A lady writes from Mass. that she made over $20 in one day. Another writes from Ill. that he made over $20 in one day. Another writes from Ohio that he made over $20 in one day. Another writes from Ohio that he made over $20 in one day. Another writes from Ohio

"LITTLE BROWN HANDS."

They drive home the cows from the pasture
Up through the long shady lane,
Where the quail whistles loud in the wheat field
All yellow with ripening grain.

They find, in the thick waving grasses,
Where the scarlet lipped strawberry grows,
They gather the earliest snowdrops,
And the first crimson buds of the rose.

They toss the hay in the meadow,
They gather the older blooms white,
They find where the dusky grapes purple
In the soft mellow October light.

They know where the apples hang ripest,
And are sweeter than Italy's wines;
They know where the fruit is the thickest
On the long, thorny blackberry vines.

They gather the delicate sea weeds,
And build tiny castles of sand;
They pick up the beautiful sea shells—
Fairy barks that have drifted to land.

They wave from the tall, rocking tree tops,
Where the robin's hammock nest swings,
And at night time are folded in slumber
By a song that a fond mother sings.

Those who toil bravely are strongest;
The humble and poor become great;
And from those brown handed children
Shall grow mighty rulers of state.

The pen of the author and statesman,
The scythe and wise of our hand;
The sword and chisel and pickaxe
Shall be held in the firm brown hand.

A BULGARIAN WEDDING.

A ST. LOUIS LADY DESCRIBES ONE WHICH SHE ATTENDED.

How a Party of Tourists Attended the Ceremony—Jottings of Travel in the Region of the Balkans—Habits Who Frightened and Intimidated the Travelers.

We were feeling pretty blue when we arrived here at 10:30 o'clock last night in a smart furious storm of thunder and lightning and the rain came down in torrents, sky black as Egypt's night.

The crowd of ruffians at the depot added anything but a cheerful feeling, and they took us in as if we were so many savages taken around for exhibition. Our trunks had to be gone through, likewise our hand baggage, and they actually insisted upon opening every small box and package inside our trunks. They held a long discussion over a shawl in one of our trunks, but finally decided to stamp our trunks through. While our courier was attending to this the natives were taking us in, and I never saw such awful looking men. They looked as if they wanted to kill us.

A ROMAN WELL.

We spent the day very agreeably, first driving up to the barracks, where we had a good view of the surroundings and saw quantities of soldiers, two of which lovely specimens of men insisted upon our visiting an old well built by the Romans, and we started down the stairs by the light of a candle, the Servian leading the way and Cousin —— and I following, but keeping very close to our courier. We persuaded the other member of our party not to attempt to come down, as it was so very damp and dark and so many steps, so left her up top with another individual, who kept talking to her in his own language all the time and pointing to the steps, and final photographs were taken. They were crowned with orange blossoms and the men all embraced afterwards; also the ladies. One of the bridesmaids was very pretty and spoke English. She made herself very pleasant and wanted to know if I had ever met a friend of hers, a Miss B., who was attending school in America. Now that I have described the wedding party, let me give you an idea of our appearance in such distinguished company.

After spending all night in the smoky, dirty train and with no accommodation for toilet, we reached here at 12 noon, hurried through some luncheon, brushed our head, and, fortunately, put on clean gloves. So we appeared amidst silks and satins, in traveling hat and dresses and the largest shoes we possessed, and feeling like tramps—I think we attracted as much attention as the bride.

Afterwards we drove through the park and then walked through the trading part of the city.

Our courier is a native of Constantinople, and says the Turks are a very dirty people and never kill any living thing, it being part of their belief that God created everything for a purpose, except the Christians. He says fleas are a natural production of the country and that we must not mind them.—Cor. St. Louis Republic.

THE FRENCH AGLEN.

During the siege of Paris, in spite of the shells that sang overhead and of the Prussian sentinels on the lookout for a mark, a great many of these bold sportsmen risked their lives outside the city fortifications and went taquiner le goujon on the banks of the Seine. These are the enthusiastic anglers who count the days and nights to the opening day, and who pass the off season in a state of settled melancholy. These are the men who know every inch of the river's banks and the holes in which the quarry lies hid, and who stand motionless hour after hour, holding their breath, heedless of rain, wind and sun, half enamoured by the gentle bobbing of the float on which their eyes are fixed. They will pass the night under a haystack in order to secure at the first streak of dawn a good place where some legendary bite had occurred and which they have carefully ground-baited over night. Though a careful man, the French fisherman never sells the contents of his basket; he fishes for his family, and the proudest hour of the day, second only to the rapturous moment of capture, is when he sees the "friture" pieced upon the table. The gudgeon, the roach, the eel, the tench, the barbel, the carp, the perch and the pike are all welcome to the angler's paste or maggot, for fly fishing he considers frivolous and as requiring a skill that is out of place in so serious a pursuit. But although the net has almost swept the French rivers clear of fish, it is against the modest angler that the law has fulminated its edicts. The fisherman may not make use of more than one line, and may only have one hook at the end of that line; he may not put his rod on the ground, but must hold it in his hand; he is bound to leave the river at sunset and may not begin to fish till sunrise.—All the Year Round.

Dyeing Hair.

Hair dyeing is not entirely a feminine fad or vice, whichever you like to call it. It is exceptional for men to take the trouble and suffer the annoyance and even pain which continual bleaching and dyeing entail. But some men are guilty of the weakness, and they are not all actors or men who live by their wits and personal appearance. Ladies generally prefer gold, but men who are dissatisfied with the natural color of their hair almost invariably go in for black. To keep up the deception, two if not three applications a week are necessary, and one customer of mine had no sooner turn every alternate day for over three years. Dyeing the hair kills it in time and makes it brittle and skin during the process, while the number of scalp diseases sacrificed at the altarine of vanity is legion. Several barbers now decline all dyeing business, and I am one of the number. But in three years now I I did my share, and admit having made a quantity of money at it. The acids used are so strong that they positively make the fingers sore, and as the scalp is much more sensitive than the fingers, the torture endured by those who subject their heads to contact with irritation in this manner can be more easily imagined than described.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Literary Curiosity.

The menu of the farewell banquet to the members of the oriental congress at Stockholm ought to take a permanent place in collections of literary curiosities. The initial "soup" or nip of schnapps which always begins a Scandinavian dinner was recorded with a song in the Kairs tongue. The soup was described in Grotzian and a song in Chinese. Prof. Max Muller wrote a song in Sanscrit praising the salmon. The filet de bœuf was mentioned by a verse in Malay and by another in Javanese. Artichaut au vinaigre was described in Coptic; cateau a la Victoria in hieroglyphics; the lobs in Hinyaritic; the cheese in Biehara. The menu concluded according to the Swedish custom with "Thanks for the dinner" written in Persian.—Berlin Letter.

An Electrician's House.

One of Edison's chiefs lives in Newark in a house which is all agog with wires. As one approaches the front gate it rings a bell in the stable and automatically. The visitor's foot on the steps of the porch rings a bell in the kitchen and also one in the master's study. By touching a button he opens the front door before the stranger has time to knock. An electrical music box plays during dinner. When the guest retires to his bedroom the folding bed unfolds by electricity. When he puts out the gas a strange, mocking display of skeletons, gravestones, owls and other hideous phantasmagoria dances about on the wall at his feet, reappearing and disappearing in a ghostly electrical glare.—Exchange.

Mr. and Mrs. Harper, of Beatrice, N. Y., weigh 756 pounds—Mrs. H., who is the better half, weighing 416.

SOME CURIOUS THINGS.

ODD AND BEAUTIFUL OBJECTS FOUND IN THE FAR EAST.

The Forest Dweller's Method of Starting Fires—Cumbersome "Coins" of the Dyak Peoples—Many and Interesting Kinds of Beads.

The forest dwelling peoples of the further east have an odd instrument for making fire. Very seldom, so far as we observed, do they employ the proverbial method of "rubbing" two sticks—which is not rubbing at all. Near the coast every man carries a bit of pitcher in the shi box or bamboo slung at his waist, a chip of a plate, English or Dutch, and a handful of dry fungus. Holding this tinder under his thumb upon the fragment of earthenware, he strikes the side of the shi box sharply, and it takes fire. But this method can only be used by tribes which have such communication with the foreigner as supplies them with European goods. The inland peoples use a more singular process. They carry a short cylinder of lead, hollowed roughly to a cupike form at one end, which fits a joint of bamboo. Placing this cylinder in the palm of the left hand, they fill the cup with tinder, adjust the bamboo over it, strike sharply, remove the covering as quickly, and the tinder is alight. Observers who take a narrow view have declared that the earliest art practiced by human beings after they escape from mere barbarism is pottery. These races have long passed that stage, but we do not recall any evidence that they use the art. The fact is that, in countries which produce the bamboo, earthenware is hardly needed except for luxury. The Dyaks employ antique vases. In neither instance do the actual "coins" pass from hand to hand, since by brass gun a Malay signifies a cannon, twenty feet long, perhaps, and a Dyak signifies a vessel eighteen inches high or more. These things are measures of value, divided into imaginary fractions. There are three varieties of this earthenware—the gusi, which represents about five sterling, the nagas and rusa, much less valuable. The first is certainly Chinese, and the last probably, but perhaps they never came from the continent. At some date unknown the north of Borneo was occupied by a Chinese colony which must have numbered millions. The great time, when a third part of the island was cultivated and densely peopled, may have been 800 years ago. But the first paragraph in the "Annals of Brunei" recognizes a powerful Chinese kingdom of Batangan in the Fifteenth century—we are not to digress into that fascinating theme, however. The Celestials were exterminated about two generations ago; an old friend of ours, the great Chief Gasing, still carried ten pigtails attached to his sword of state—trophies of his father's valor, probably. Chinese merchants have tried again and again to counterfeit the old jars, as have the Dutch, but they never succeeded—

A journal devoted to the art of advertising. Contains more valuable information than any other publication of its class. It is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—the trade journal, so to speak—of American advertising. It tells the interesting and inexpensive advertise-in-plain-words methods which have worked and which are now working wonders for others, and gives the experience of others in advertising; how to display your wants and surprises at slight outlay to your much to expend—in fact, discusses on every point that adults of profitable advertising. If you advertise at all, PRINTERS' INK can help you. Nothing you request but You believe a year's advertising if so, PRINTERS' INK may show you how to obtain double the service you are now getting for money that is lost. Going north every afternoon, except Sunday—most curious fact of all. That they are ancient Egyptian is a certainty.

Many hundreds, if not thousands, were taken in the sack of the palace at Gomassie, strung, in general, upon that very pretty cord which we mentioned, with gold nuggets beaten flat, and cubes of coral and turks of colored silk interspersed. Very handsome they looked, no doubt, upon the smooth brown skin of the royal dames. A pretty bracelet from Coomassie is made of triangular pieces cut from the rib of a shell, snow white, strung in groups alternately with these small flattened nuggets. But the curiosities saved in that lost bear only a miserable proportion to those which men of taste admired in the palace and the big houses of the cabocceers. But one stool was carried away—as a memorial for the Princess of Wales—among the hundreds adorned with silver which lay in all directions. Very charming were many of those the Ashantee artist seemed to devote his best attention to the stool. Seven were piled, as if for removal, in the courtyard of a great house, each plated with repousse work, showing much taste and ingenuity of design. These people have "gifts."—Saturday Review.

Charles Scribner's Sons, 743 Broadway, New York.

A Daily Paper FOR 1 Cent a Day.

A daily newspaper now costs but little more than the old-time weekly. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an impartial, independent newspaper. It is a member of the Associated Press. It prints all the news and sells it for 1 cent a day. Mailed, postpaid, for $3.00 per year, or 25 cents per month. This is $3.00 per year less than the price of any other Chicago morning paper. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is not a blanket-sheet. It is a condensed paper. You can read it and still have time left for an honest day's work. It is a daily paper for busy people. It has been the aim to put into the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS the first law of nature and the republican party would not have put with those losses in the 25 chief woal raising counties of Ohio if the people of that state feared the consequences of free wool as the republicans pretend they do.

In Massachusetts, outside of Boston, the democrats made substantial gains in Adams, North Adams, Lee, Palmer, Greenfield, Ware, East Hampton, and in the manufacturing towns of the eastern part of the state. In Boston, a deal between the republican candidate for governor and the saloon keepers defeated the election of Mr. Russell, but outside of Boston the democrats made gains of from 10 to 20 per cent. in all the industrial towns of the state. Without the Boston saloons, these gains would have elected the democratic candidate for governor.

Whether we look east or west, therefore, we see that the cause of reduced taxation is stronger than it ever was before. If the republican papers hold the truth before the election, the people in Ohio have made an explicit declaration in favor of lower tariff; if those papers tell the truth since the election, the farmers of Ohio and Iowa care very little about the tariff; and are quite willing to help the tariff reduction movement for the sake of voting against Mr. Hutchison or Mr. Foraker on personal grounds. It is perfectly plain that the tariff reformers have won a great victory or that the high protectionists have lost their grip on the western farmers, and this is almost the same thing.—National Democrat.

Tariff Reform in an Off Year.

If the elections of last week had resulted differently every republican newspaper in the country would have claimed that the administration had been splendidly indorsed. The elections not having gone differently, we are assured, in the language of Mr. Toots, that it is of no consequence; the issues were entirely local.

There are several newspapers that are hardly in a condition to offer this explanation with decency. The New York Tribune, the New York Press, the Philadelphia Press, and the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, told us over and over again, during the campaign, that the tariff was the great question in Ohio; that what ever people thought of Foraker they ought to vote for him because the democrats were running a regular revenue reform campaign. Each one of these papers tried to make votes for Foraker by insisting that the wool duties were at stake. Each one of them assured the world that if Ohio elected Campbell it would be a declaration that Ohio was in favor of free wool. Up to the day of the election Mr. Clarkson's newspaper was shouting to the people of Iowa to vote the republican ticket without regard to the local issues involved, because the tariff was the great stake; the Iowa farmers must vote for Hutchison whether he was a tool of the railroad corporations or not, because a vote for Boies would be a vote for tariff reduction. While it is true that prohibition and the railroads furnished the burning questions in Iowa, it is also true that Mr. Boies made strong tariff reform speeches; he gave the national questions, as Mr. Campbell did in Ohio, their full share of attention. The papers we have named are hardly in shape to say now that the elections had no national significance.

The tariff question was made especially prominent in the manufacturing town of Akron, and the county of Summit, containing Akron, gave Foraker 252 less votes than it gave him two years ago, and it gave Campbell 680 votes more than it gave Powell then. As compared with the presidential election Foraker showed a loss of 1,082 and Campbell a loss of 693. Nine counties in Ohio have over 100,000 sheep in each; two years ago 6 of those were republican and 3 democratic. This year the republicans lost 4 democratic. In 1887 the net republican plurality was 1,003; in 1889 there was a net democratic plurality in the same 16. The 16 counties that have from fifty to a hundred thousand sheep each gave a net republican plurality of 6,688 in 1887 and 4,526 in 1889, a reduction of 2,092.

We do not say the election of Mr. Campbell was a great and conclusive victory for tariff reform; we recognize all the political questions that entered into the contest. But our preservation is the first law of nature and the republican party would not have put with those losses in the 25 chief woal raising counties of Ohio if the people of that state feared the consequences of free wool as the republicans pretend they do.

In Massachusetts, outside of Boston, the democrats made substantial gains in Adams, North Adams, Lee, Palmer, Greenfield, Ware, East Hampton, and in the manufacturing towns of the eastern part of the state. In Boston, a deal between the republican candidate for governor and the saloon keepers defeated the election of Mr. Russell, but outside of Boston the democrats made gains of from 10 to 20 per cent. in all the industrial towns of the state. Without the Boston saloons, these gains would have elected the democratic candidate for governor.

Whether we look east or west, therefore, we see that the cause of reduced taxation is stronger than it ever was before. If the republican papers hold the truth before the election, the people in Ohio have made an explicit declaration in favor of lower tariff; if those papers tell the truth since the election, the farmers of Ohio and Iowa care very little about the tariff; and are quite willing to help the tariff reduction movement for the sake of voting against Mr. Hutchison or Mr. Foraker on personal grounds. It is perfectly plain that the tariff reformers have won a great victory or that the high protectionists have lost their grip on the western farmers, and this is almost the same thing.—National Democrat.

☞ The Jury in the Case of Harrison vs. Cleveland.

Assistant Postmaster General Clarkson and other gentlemen who insisted before the election that the republican party was on trial and must be sustained irrespective of local questions, and who have discovered since the election that the administration and national politics were not involved at all, are telling us that it always happens this way: The dissatisfied office seekers turn in with the opposition and defeat the administration party at the first election after an inauguration. The reply to this is found in large democratic gains in New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, Iowa and Virginia in 1885 over 1884.

In Massachusetts the republicans had 24,732 majority in 1884, a presidential year, and 21,134 in 1885, an "off" year, a loss of only 2,475. In 1888, a presidential year, the party had 32,037 majority, and in 1889, an "off" year, it got less than 6,000. This is a loss of over 26,000, and the only explanation is that the Harrison administration does not begin to be as strong with the republicans as the Cleveland administration was with the democrats. In Ohio the republicans got 37,982 majority in 1884 and 17,541 in 1885. Tod is a decrease, on account of its being an off year, of 20,000. But the republicans got 19,599 in 1888 and the democrats got about 12,000 in 1889, a republican loss of 31,000.

Nov. 26.—The farmers are all rejoicing over the very fine fall weather we have had for fall work.

O. D. Hilton sold a horse to David Prosser last week.

Edwin Cook has about 30 hogs.

Mr. Cummings has three very fine two-year-old colts. He is also getting out posts for a large amount of new fence to be built next spring.

Thos. Hadden is getting out ties on John Bell's place.

Jim and Chancy Harrington dug a well for George Wells last week.

Wm. Wiles has moved to O. D. Wood's farm to work for the winter.

The band boys at Norwood are getting along well with their music. They have a dance Thanksgiving night.

Nash's camps are full of men now.

A Grand Rapids agent was around last week getting contracts to sow garden peas next summer.

Mrs. Max Gerrett and Mrs. Olen Weed are still on the sick list.

George O'Brian is living in the same house with his brother James this winter.

Albert Wells and wife of Banks are visiting relatives in this vicinity this week.

Alfred Van Deusen has built a high barnyard fence to protect his sheep from dogs, and other sheep farmers will have to do likewise as dogs are very troublesome.

Geo. Wells has returned from the lumber woods and reports no work for teams until snow comes.

That bubbling, Brother Burgess, which you heard the pipe is the republican party in Ohio and Iowa. Another year they will be buried so deep you can't even hear them bubble.

Six years ago Lizzie Wheaton married Antoine Duval, and he got killed by a tree which fell on him. This fall she married Joe Hollister, and last Friday a tree fell on him and nearly killed him. Verily, it is a singular coincidence.

Nov. 26.—A two weeks old child of Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Brown of this township died Nov. 18th and was buried at East Jordan.

The furnace in Boston shut down on the 19th, and it is reported will not resume business until next fall. During this time it will be repaired whenever necessary. The yard at Ironton and the beach of Pine Lake is cleared of furnace wood, yet it is reported that the Company will not buy or cut any this winter. If this is true, business will be pretty dull around here this winter.

J. G. Peterson and wife entertained a large number of people Saturday evening, at their "house warming." Mr. Peterson passed the cigars to the men and boys down stairs, while Mrs. P. and the ladies had a good time up stairs with confectionery, music, etc. We are glad to see Mr. Peterson once more established in business.

On Friday evening last about thirty young friends of Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Parish, of Ironton, gave them a very pleasant surprise.

Joseph Tuttle and wife have gone to Boyne City for the winter, and are stopping at the Pine Lake House. Joe has been engaged to drive the stage between Boyne City and Boyne Falls for A. J. Hall.

Advance.

Nov. 26.—Turkeys begin to wish they had never been born. And even as the hog begins to take lots of comfort, a cruel death is fast approaching him. But although a sudden death is sure to overtake the enterprising turkey and the lazy hog, who knows but what in some of the future cycles of time both the turkey and the hog will have been developed into the lordly race of the genus homo, and then they can enjoy their Thanksgiving dinners, and can have their toothsome patenkle. But we will stop speculating in future probabilities, and relate some facts (?).

Godfrey Von Platen has returned home from Chicago.

Charles Norton is home for a few days from Beech's lumber camp.

Sam Hayden of East Jordan was in town yesterday. He has quit the firm of French & Co., and will buy wool this winter for a Milwaukee firm.

Mrs. Vaughn of Mancelona was here last week visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. David Willis.

The captain of the Julia Larson bought about 700 bushels of potatoes at this place last week, paying 23 and 25 cents a bushel.

Echo.

Nice weather, but cold.

Miss Lola King of South Arm township is staying with her sister, Mrs. T. Bartholomew, for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Murray recently had a new arrival. It is a boy, and all are doing well.

Alfred Schofield has moved his family into South Arm township where he is lumbering for the East Jordan Lumber Co.

We hear that a young lady (?) of this township was caught shop-lifting at East Jordan last week. We know Echo had a hard name, but supposed men were the chief offenders.

John Pearl of Eastport was in town Tuesday.

Geo. Smith went to Mancelona last Saturday.

Running Amuck in Borneo.

A curious case of amuck took place recently at Sandakan, the capital of British North Borneo. The governor held a durbar at Government house, at which about one hundred and fifty native chiefs were present. At the close of the meeting outdoor sports were held, and during the progress of these one of the men became excited, drew his sword, and began to attack every one in his way. He first cut and slashed at an Englishman who was not looking toward him, and then pursued his way rapidly through the public buildings right and left. He missed another European, wounded two Sikhs, and rushed at a Sikh sergeant major, who, having a stick in his hand, struck the man's forearm and forced him to drop his sword. He was then seized, put in irons, and his disastrous progress thus terminated.—London Times.

L. G. Evans of Eastport and Almira Mitchell of Milton, were married last week.

THE WORK DAY IN EUROPE

LONGER AND WEARIER THAN MAN CAN WELL STAND.

Official Reports for All Continental Countries—Ten Hours Is a Short Day's Work. Women Work Ten Hours—Men Twelve or More.

A report just issued in pursuance of an address from the house of commons throws considerable light on the question of working hours in Europe.

In France the hours of adult labor are regulated by a series of decrees, of which the earliest, promulgated September, 1848, enacts that the workingman's day in manufactories and mills shall not exceed twelve hours of "effective" or actual labor. A decree issued in May, 1851, made exceptions, so that more hours might be worked in certain trades. In 1883 a circular was issued stating that the limit of twelve hours per diem was not to be imposed where hand power was employed, but was to be confined to manufactories and mills in which the motive power was machinery. No workshops were to come under the clauses of the act that did not employ more than twenty hands in any one shed. The report says: "It is likewise to be borne in mind that there is in France no compulsory observance of Sunday, and no day of habitual rest."

"EFFECTIVE LABOR."

The reports of the French inspectors of labor appear to show that the act of 1848 is very loosely interpreted. It is even doubtful whether the section limit the actual working day to twelve hours was intended to include or exclude hours of rest. Practically, the legal time is made to exclude rest. This makes the working day so much the longer. Thus, one of the French inspectors states that the hours of attendance in factories under the act of 1848 are from 5 in the morning until 7 in the evening, or a total of fourteen hours, out of which there are twelve hours of "effective labor." But the same authority also states that "effective" time often extends to thirteen and fourteen hours in many weaving establishments. Finally, we are told that, "as a rule," it may be taken that Frenchmen employed in factories are present in the shops at least fourteen hours out of every twenty-four.

Among the countries having no law affecting the hours of adult labor, Germany is conspicuous. Employers, however, cannot force their servants to work on Sundays and feast days. Employment of youthful or female labor in certain kinds of factories, which is attended with special danger to health or morals, is forbidden, or made conditional on certain regulations, by which night labor for female workpeople is especially forbidden. In Germany, as in other countries also, women may not be employed in factories for a certain time after childbirth. In Hesse-Darmstadt the medium duration of labor is from ten to twelve hours; the cases in which the latter time is exceeded being, however, more frequent than those in which the former is not exceeded. The normal work day throughout Saxony in all the principal branches of industry is from 6 a. m. to 7 p. m., with half an hour for breakfast, an hour for dinner and half an hour for supper. In the manufacturing districts there are departures from these hours, the period of work in spinning and weaving mills not infrequently being twelve hours.

EXTENSIVE LEGISLATION.

In Austria the law provides that the duration of work for factory hands shall not exceed eleven hours out of the twenty-four, "exclusive" of the periods of rest. These are not to be less in the aggregate than an hour and a half. The rule can be modified by the minister of commerce, in conjunction with the minister of the interior, allowing longer hours. The hours have been so extended to twelve hours in certain industries, such as spinning mills, and even to thirteen in silk manufactories. Sunday rest is enforced. In Hungary there is no limit laid down by law, but the hours are not generally longer than in Austria.

Concerning the actual hours of adult labor in Belgium, some difficulty is said to be experienced in getting at the facts. The evidence given before a Belgian royal commission showed that railway guards are sometimes on duty for fifteen and even nineteen and a half hours at a stretch; and the Brussels tramway drivers are at work from fifteen to seventeen hours daily, with a rest of only an hour and a half at noon. Brickmakers work during the summer months sixteen hours a day. In the sugar refineries the average hours are from twelve to thirteen for men and from nine to six for women. The cabinetmakers, both at Ghent and Brussels, assert that they have often to work seventeen hours a day.

In Switzerland the law provides that a normal working day shall not exceed eleven hours, reduced on Saturdays and public holidays to ten. Power is reserved for prolonging the working day in certain circumstances. Except in cases of absolute necessity Sunday labor is prohibited, and in establishments where uninterrupted labor is required each working hand must have one free Sunday out of two. Women cannot under any circumstances be employed in night or Sunday labor. Italy has not legislated for adults, but has made regulations for child labor. Sweden is in the same position. Spain and Portugal have done nothing. The general rule in the latter country, applying to old and young, is to work from sunrise to sunset, an hour and a half being allowed for meals. In the Netherlands a law was recently promulgated to prevent excessive and dangerous work by grown up women and young persons. In Turkey the working day lasts from sunrise to sunset, with certain intervals for repose and refreshing. In Russia, where there are no laws affecting the hours of adult labor, the normal working day in industrial establishments averages twelve hours.—St. James' Gazette.

Scotch Names the Queerest.

In England there is a great variety of personal nomenclature, and, though we have plenty of Smiths, Browns and Robinsons, we have nothing approaching to the poverty, in this respect, which characterizes many localities in North Britain. In certain parts of Scotland, not only have the surnames been few, but there has been a strong disposition to ring the changes on a very few Christian names, with the result that the community, in its desire to distinguish between persons of precisely the same name, has been obliged to provide each with a special label, or "to-name," by which he can be known. A contributor to The Scotsman says that in the district of Lewis in a Scotch fishing town occur such "to-names" as "Ieadhy," "Pum," "Iem," "Cock," "Post," "Bo," "Sandyke," "Helen's James," and so on.

Such appellations as these are not necessarily nicknames, as we understand them. Sometimes they are patronymics, sometimes they are local in allusion, sometimes they refer to individual occupations, sometimes they are personally descriptive, sometimes they are mere identifications, "signifying nothing."

Occasionally they are simply variations upon a single Christian name. Thus it may be, one John Bruce, popularly called "Jock," has a son named William, who becomes "Jock's Wull." His son, again, who is called William, becomes "Jock's Wull's Williamie," while the last named's son, if also called William, becomes "Jock's Wull's Williamie's Wullsie." A further form is "Wullsikie," but that, probably, is rarely used. The still obtains in Scotland, and if it were introduced into this country it might prove a sense of the confusion which exists among our John Smiths, Thomas Browns and William Robinsons.—London Globe.

Its Mother Was in the Baggage Car.

It was on a Pennsylvania railroad train, coming north from Washington. All the passengers but two in the sleeper had dozed off. The exceptions were a young man and a baby. The former was willing to follow the example of the majority, but the latter objected in a loud voice. Its cries awoke the other passengers, and some pretty strong language was heard. The young man got out of his berth and hurried the baby up and down the car, trying to soothe it. But the baby was ailing and fretful, and its voice would not be stilled. Finally a gray headed man, who was evidently an old traveler, stuck his head out from behind the curtains and called to the young man in a rather sharp voice:

"See here, sir, why don't you take that child to its mother. She will be able to manage it much better than you. It evidently wants its mother."

"Yes, that's it," echoed half a dozen other irritated passengers.

The young man continued to pace up and down for a moment, then said, in a quiet, strained voice:

"Its mother is in the baggage car."

There was an instantaneous hush for a moment. Precently the gray headed man stuck his head out into the aisle again.

"Let me take it for a while," he said, softly; "perhaps I can quiet it."—New York Sun.

Business Capacity.

A popcorn vender on one of the streets near the Bowery was turning a pretty penny, while it seems that another engaged in the same trade is not doing so well. A daily patron of the successful merchant, after buying his sack of corn yesterday, asked:

"Why is it that you don't keep one stand? Yesterday you were nearly two blocks down the street, and the day before you were at some other place. Why don't you stay at one place and keep to one? you will have a regular custom?"

The Italian vendor replied for persuasion:

"No regular customas. People a-buya when da tink of it. Pasea one man and buya at anoda. Seea lotsa people on street? Hope yoa corn slow, 'cause nobody buy. Wind blowa from him to me. Mana pasea him comin' up street, smell popcorn and tink he like buy, but wind mana go back. Bea no man wanta buy. Mana goin' down street smell de corn before he reacha me, stopa mana buy. To-morrow maybe wind blowa other way. Ia go below otha man. Him makea de appetite, I sella de corn. Him tinka staya one place people know him and he geta all trade. People know nobody buy at da place."—Kansas City Times.

The Chisel Was Too Wide.

There is a proverb about biting your own nose of to spite your face; but here is an instance of cutting off one's toes to spite one's corn. Several years ago, says The Pittsfield Advertiser, "a Pittsfield man becoming angry at the pain caused by a corn on one of his toes pulled off his boot and toes, took a chisel and cut the toe off. The chisel happened to be wider than was necessary, so more toes were cut off than he was really intendiar about. The man then walked into the house, sat down and fainted, the wounded foot bare and bleeding, some distance to a surgeon's, where the injuries received were dressed. The man's temper must have been worse than his corn.

Spanish Eyes.

The eyes are the one redeeming feature of the Spanish face. It is impossible to describe these data, living, earnest, full of a diverse soulfulness that makes them most disastrous things to encounter. Add to this a strong, arching eyebrow, long, curling black lashes, a perfect nose and a mouth that, now and then, a pair of glorious eyes that vainly endeavor to convince one that high cheek bones, thick or very thin lips, artfully painted a deep carmine, and a lazy sensuous expression combine to form a beautiful face.—Cor. What Is Light?

Several theories have been advanced by scientists to account for the fact that we have light. The two principles of the many reasons given by these learned gentlemen are the emission or corpuscular theory, and that known as the undulatory theory. The principles of the emission theory originated in the fertile brain of Isaac Dessagres, philosopher, who was born in 1596. But little attention was given the theory, and it and Descartes were both almost forgotten when the same theory was enunciated and worked out by Sir Isaac Newton, about sixty years later.

According to these eminent men, light consists of small particles emitted by luminous bodies, the velocity of its transmission mainly regulating its color.

The undulatory theory has now generally accepted by the scientific world, tells us that the space between the celestial bodies is occupied by an imponderable ether. The luminousness of a body is supposed to be due to rapid, vibratory motion proceeding from the body in question to the eye. The waves of the light proceed in all directions from every luminous point in straight lines, the motion of its particles being supposed to undulate in transverse direction to the line in which the light travels. The velocity of light is so great that the human mind cannot grasp an idea of the rapidity with which it travels. The best authorities attaintable to the writer, the distance traveled by light in one single second, is about 190,000 miles, a distance so great that no perceptible space of time would be occupied in its passage between any two given points on the earth's surface.—St. Louis Republic.

She Misunderstood.

"I have a great mind to go to the club to-night," said Mr. J.—to his wife.

"What?" she replied, with surprise.

"I have a great mind to go to the club to-night."

"Whose?"

"Whose what?"

"Whose great mind?"

"Why, my own, of course, madam."

"Oh!" And the rising inflection she gave the ejaculation was very provoking to a man of fine feeling.—London Tid Bits.

How to Know a Bird.

To know the name of a bird is of comparatively little value; to know to what class he belongs is of no great moment; in short, to know him from the scientific standpoint amounts to little so far as the child is concerned. It he becomes a specimen he will learn all that quickly in later life. But to love birds, and to form habits of observation sufficient to watch carefully every bird, is worth as much as any branch of study. No training of the ear is better than that which comes from listening to the song of birds; no training in color knowledge is better than determination of their hues and tints; no better form study than appreciation of their nests, no better discipline in the study of motion than in the study of their hopping, pecking and flying.—Journal of Education.

The Tartan Not an Ancient Scotch Dress.

"No patriotic Scotch lady need answer herself in tartan under the impression that it was the ancient dress of her ancestors. The truth is that no Scotch prince (except the Chevalier) ever wore tartan in Highland dress. Before George IV himself, and any of the Jameses would set as much as the thought of holding a court in a dressing gown. It was never in early times the dress of Scotland, or of the Scottish clans, of which it is generally that you do not find it in the ancient family portraits in Scotland. Shoulder plaids were worn, but they were not tartans, and the clans were distinguished by cognes in their bonnets."—Court Circular.

There seems to be quite an exodus of mechanics and laborers from Charlevoix to the western states this fall, and more will leave in a few days. Had a showing for a community when a mechanic can save enough during the summer to travel for health and pleasure in the winter.

By the kindness of Mrs. I. S. Webster, of Hayes, the JOURNAL editor and family are favored with a pair of good fat chickens for Thanksgiving dinner. If our readers find their paper a few hours late they may understand that we took time to properly enjoy the chickens.

The Epworth League of the M. E. church will give a Merry England supper at Bartholomew's hall, on Friday evening, Dec. 6th, from 5 to 8 o'clock. Refreshments will be served for the accommodation of the public. Supper 25 cents.

☞With this new moulding machine W. H. Frame furnishes builders with mouldings, frames and all house finish. Call at the shop on south terrace.

The Elk Rapids Progress, speaking of the probable extension of the C. & W. M. from Traverse City to Charlevoix and Petoskey, says: If the C. & W. M. should want to come this way we think the people of this place, Eastport, Torch Lake, etc., would only be too glad to offer proper inducements for its construction along the bay shore. It would not only be a nearer and be a better route to Charlevoix and Petoskey, but it would lay in a better strip of farming country than it would if it went by the way of Ballaire and Central Lake Though it would not be accessible to all of the farmers it would be reached by a majority of them.

Explosive Motto Social.

The young people of the Congregational church will give their next social at the home of their pastor on Wednesday evening, December 4, 1889.

Something new and unique on the program,—explosive mottos. Refreshments and literary exercises. All for 15 cts. for those above fifteen, children 10 cents. Proceeds to apply on the fund to paint the church. Everybody come.

Historical Society.

The second meeting of the society at L. E. Allen's last week included a vocal solo by Miss Edith Mason, paper by A. T. Washburne on the "Foundation and development of the U. S. Government," select readings by Mrs. Andrews and Miss Nelson, and instrumental duet—Miss Carrie Allen. The next meeting will be with Mr. and Mrs. Buttars, on Dec. 6th.

Congregational Church.

At the Congregational Church next Sunday morning subject—"Righteousness and Fearlessness of Christ's character, "Enjoyment Versus Amusement."

Thanksgiving Services.

On account of the storm this morning, Thanksgiving services were postponed to Thursday evening at the Baptist church.

Advertising in England.

Very noteworthy in matter and manner are the advertising pages of the weekly and monthly papers and magazines. The Queen and Myra's Journal contain many pages of announcements of drapers and dealers in dress fabrics well written, and very tastefully as to type, and often very strikingly illustrated. In none of our American periodicals, even those of the Harper and Harper's Magazine, is the high plane of art so well maintained. The English editions of these magazines are superior in their advertising departments to the American, quite as much so as in literary merit. The last Christmas Harper was a prodigy of bulk and variety, being equal in bulk size by the "favors" of English advertisers. Interleaving is a favorite device, but much of this is done by the publishers themselves I do not know, but circulars and hand bills in all colors and often quaint typography flutter from the leaves of every magazine, and sample of cloth, cocoa, cocoaine, baking powder and what not are put up in pretty envelopes and lie sandwiched, not only between leaves and signatures, but at the most pathetic point of your shilling novel.

The same fraud which all will informed on now permeates the trotting turf at the present time then ran riot among the rumers. So open did the scandal become that upon one famous day more than half a century ago, all the gentlemen turfites in America announced their withdrawal from all participation in this sport, and immediately said turf stables to the highest bidders and at figures so low that the term "highest" is really the depth of sarcasm.—Moore's Handy.

The Human Ear.

Few people realize what a wonderfully delicate structure the human ear really is. That which we ordinarily designate so is, after all, only the mere entry point of a series of winding passages, which, like lobbies of a great building, lead from the world without to the world within.

Certain of these passages are full of liquid, and their membranes are stretched like parchment curtains across the corridor at different places, and can be thrown into vibration or made to tremble like the head of a drum or the surface of a tambourine does when struck with a stick or with the fingers. Between two of these parchment like curtains a chain of very small bones extends, which serves to tighten or relax these membranes and to communicate vibrations to them. In the innermost place of all a row of white threads, called nerves, stretch like the strings of a piano from the last point to which the membranes or thrillings reach and pass inward to the brain. A wonderful piece of mechanism.—St. Louis Republic.

Points About Finger Nails.

A white mark on the nail bespeaks misfortune.

Pale or lead colored nails indicate melancholy people.

Broad nails indicate a gentle, timid and bashful nature.

Lovers of knowledge and literal sentiment have round nails.

People with narrow nails are ambitious and quarrelsome.

Small nails indicate littleness of mind, obstinacy and conceit.

Crooked, narrow nails, delighting in war, have red and spotted nails.

Nails growing into the flesh at the points and sides indicate luxurious tastes.

People with very pale nails are subject to much inflammation of the flesh and persecution by neighbors and friends.—Medical Classics.

Broken Friendship.

It happened at a ball in Austin, Tex. A fashionable young lady, who was very homely, was speaking to a female friend about a rich young gentleman who was also at the ball, and who was considered quite a catch.

"He is such an intelligent and charming young man. He promised to dance the first dance with me, and he hope his promise like a gentleman," remarked the homely young lady.

"Yes," responded her friend, yawning. "I heard him say that it was one of his points of life, when he had anything disagreeable to do, to go at it as soon as possible and get it over with."

Those two young ladies have not been seen on the street since.—Texas Siftings.

He Retracted.

A Texas editor, having charged that the father of a rival editor had been in the penitentiary, was notified that he must retract or die. He retracted as follows: "We find that we were mistaken in our statement last week that The Eagle editor's sire had been in the penitentiary. His efforts of his friends to have his sentence commuted to imprisonment for life failed, and he was hanged."—Texas Siftings.

DECEMBER MAGAZINES.

Scribner's.

Scribner's Magazine for December is a Holiday number of striking beauty and attractiveness in its illustrations, and the text of the articles will appeal to the fancy and sympathy of readers, rather than to their desire for instruction in practical affairs. With the exception of the fourth installment of Harold Frederic's serial, each article is complete in this issue. The contents include a sympathetic study of life in the poorest quarters of New York's tenements; a vigorous end paper sure to provoke discussion, by Edward J. Phelps, Esq., ex-Minister to England; a genial and discriminating review of the whole field of American humorous drawing, by J. A. Mitchell, the founder and editor of Life; another story by Mr. H. C. Bunner, editor of Puck, whose "Zadoc Pine," and "Squire Five-cent-piece," in previous Christmas issues, will be recalled; a vivid and picturesque account of some characteristic Breton festivals; and a sunny picture of life and eccentric character on some of the least frequented of the Bahama Islands.

Godey's.

"Godey's Lady's Book" for December has filled the bill in being a real Christmas number. A beautiful steel plate illustration, "Baby's First Christmas," is a gem; a handsome colored fashion plate is devoted to the ladies, and a folded colored sheet is designed expressly for the little folks; this is a real work of art. The illustrated story, "The Force of Will," by Max Vander Wyde, is well worthy of perusal. "Five Thousand Dollars for a Wife," by the author of "Wedded to Misery," is one of the new serials which certainly opens with much interest. Among the short home stories is "The Story of Agnes," by Mrs. Nora Marble, "Ralph of Ashmead," by Olivia, and "Sodalicia's Christmas Dinner," by T. H. Farnham. Several good poems are interspersed. "A Wheel of Fortune by Olivia Lovell Wilson, is another serial; all who know this popular author can realize the treat the readers of Godey have in store for 1890. "The Children's Corner" is a new feature which cannot fail to please the little folks. "The Beautiful Home Club," by Emma J. Gray, "Fashions, "Work Designs" and illustrations, "Household Department," by Mrs. L. D. Hope, and "Our Arm Chair" completes the last number for 1889, which shows no falling off, but is better than the opening one of the year. Godey Publishing Co., 1220 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Western Rural, Chicago.

We call the attention of our readers to The Western Rural and American Stockman, one of the oldest and best known of our agricultural and family newspapers. Upon questions of political economy and reform The Rural is one of the ablest exponents of agriculture and a faithful worker in behalf of the farmer and his best interests. The single subscription price of The Rural and Stockman is $1.50 per year, of fifty-two issues. For free sample copies address

French Polish.

"That young man is terrible green," said a farmer, who did not admire the airs of a neighbor's son, just returned home after a year's post graduate study in France.

"Why, pa, I don't see how you can call him green!" said the farmer's daughter.

"Such a splendidly educated young man, and he's been in Paris, too!"

"Humph!" said her father. "I suppose never heard of such a thing as Paris green?"—Detroit Tribune.

Still at the Old Stand.

The big Lick telescope, the largest in the world, has caught on to some distant stars not to be seen by the ordinary telescope, but it hasn't revealed the landscape of the moon or discovered anything startling about the make up of Old Sol. Sol & Luna are still doing business at the old stand, where all their customers will be promptly attended to.—Detroit Free Press.

Stephen A. Douglas.

I am not a democrat and have given most of my votes to the republican party, but I like to see fair play.

The ungenerous manner in which the republican press treats the democrat party has induced me to offer the following concerning Stephen A Douglas and his supporters. Mr. Douglas was the regular democrat candidate for the presidency in 1860. There were four candidates in the field but Mr. Douglas was the least sectional of them all, and therefore received votes in more states than any other candidates. At the polls he received 1,365,976 votes, but in the electoral college only 12 votes. Mr. Lincoln at the polls received 1,857,610 votes and in the electoral college 180 votes; hence, 10,3293 votes at the polls counted as much toward the election of Mr. Lincoln as 113,811½ votes for Mr. Douglas. Mr. Douglas did not complain but said:

"I understand it that the voice of the people in the mode appointed by the constitution commands the obedience of every citizen."

The union army was largely made up of Douglas democrats. Mr. Lincoln received 1,857,610 votes but in the union army were over 2,000,000 men.

Fort Sumpter surrendered April 13th, 1861. The next day Hon. George Ashmun (who was chairman of the convention that nominated Mr. Lincoln) called upon Mr. Douglas and begged him to give his moral support to the new administration. Mr. Douglas hesitated and said "Mr. Lincoln has dealt with me hardly, in removing some of my friends from office, and I don't know as he wants my advice or aid."

Mr. Douglas, however, went with Mr. Ashmun to visit Mr. Lincoln. During the interview Mr. Lincoln read his call for 75,000 troops which he intended to issue the next day. When he had finished, Mr. Douglas rose from his chair and said:

"Mr. President, I cordially concur in every word of that document, except that instead of the call for seventy-five thousand men I would make it two hundred thousand. You do not know the dishonest purposes of those men as well as I do." By Mr. Ashmun's wish the following was published the next day:

"Mr. Douglas called upon the president this evening, and had an interesting conversation on the present condition of the country. The substance of the conversation was, that while Mr. Douglas was unalterably opposed to the administration on all his political issues, he was prepared to sustain the president in the exercise of all his constitutional functions to preserve the union, and maintain the government, and defend the federal capital. A firm policy and prompt action were necessary. The capital of our country was in danger and must be defended at all hazards, and at any expense of men and money. He spoke of the present and the future without reference to the past."

On the 1st of May he addressed ten thousand people in Chicago. We give a few extracts to show the animus of that address:

"The question is, are we to maintain the country of our fathers, or allow it to be stricken down by those who, when they can no longer govern, threaten to destroy?" Again: "There can be no neutrals in this war, only patriots or traitors."

Soon after that address he was taken sick and on the third of June he died. In the delirium of his illness, the condition of his country was his constant theme, and his language that of an anxious patriot. Let us remember that party interests and ambitious hopes sustained the patriotism of Mr. Lincoln; not so with Mr. Douglas. We do not know what Mr. Lincoln would have done had he been in the place of Mr. Douglas, but this we know: He could not have shown more unselfish patriotism. While we load the memory of Mr. Lincoln with honors let us not spit upon the memory of Mr. Douglas and his friends who rushed to the support of a republican administration, and who, many of them, gave their blood and lives to our country. W. W. H.

Republicans and the Cronin Murderers

There is a curious political side to the Cronin case. If the bill is true, the chief actors in the conspiracy to assassinate the doctor were republicans. The doctor himself was a republican. Coughlin was a republican on the police force, Burke had employment for a time under a republican city administration. Beggs was the president of the Irish-American republican club, and as such made a pilgrimage to Indianapolis a year ago and addressed candidate Harrison as a man and a brother. Scully while before, he had been an inmate of the Ohio penitentiary. The later conspiracy to thwart the ends of justice sought out and brought two republican ward hustlers honored by the sheriff with positions of trust.

And the great idol of all these cronies, those despicable riff-raff, was the godlike Blaine.—Chicago Times.

CLUB RATES.

To accommodate those of our subscribers who do not have a city paper, and who will miss the general news features heretofore found on our ready-print pages, we will take subscriptions for the JOURNAL and the Detroit Weekly Free Press, until January 1, 1890, at $1.60 per year. Cash in advance.

This is really much cheaper to the subscriber than the eight-page JOURNAL was at $1.50, as the Weekly Free Press contains 12 large pages of small type, giving all the news of the state, besides a complete synopsis of the principal domestic and foreign events of the week, and the best stories and miscellany ever published.

At this club rate all subscriptions MUST be paid in Advance in Cash.

Sample copies of the Free Press may be had at this office.

The New Discovery.

You have heard your friends and neighbors talking about it. You may yourself be one of the many who know from personal experience just how good a thing it is. If you have ever tried it, you are one of its staunch friends, because the wonderful thing about it is, that when once given a trial, or, king's New discovery ever after holds a place in the house. If you have never used it and should be afflicted with a cough, cold or any throat, lung or chest trouble, secure a bottle at once and give it a fair trial. It is guaranteed every time, or money refunded. Trial bottles free at r. G. Hines & Co.'s drug store.

PRINTERS' INK.

PRINTERS' INK is just what its purports to be, "a journal for advertisers." It is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—the trade journal, so to speak—of American advertisers. It tells the intending and inexperienced advertiser in plain, comprehensive articles how, when, and where to advertise; how to write an advertisement; how to design one; what newspapers or other media to use; how much to expend—in fact, discusses on every point that admits of profitable discussion. If you advertise at all, PRINTERS' INK can help you. Perhaps you expend but Ten Dollars a year in advertising; if so, PRINTERS' INK may show you how to make double the service you are now getting for exactly the money. A year's subscription costs but Ten Dollars—a single copy cost but Five Cents. Advertising as art practiced by many but understood by few. The conditions of PRINTERS' INK understand it thoroughly. Surely their advice, based on an experience of more than twenty-five years, will help you. Address:—

"REMINDED."

And ever thus, the same doll echo
From secret heart pangs, fed by tears,
Thy woman's pride forbids thee when
Tokens or signs, from thy earliest years,
Have many lands of greater cost,
Show tinsel lead and heart of gold,
Then nobly turn in rage apart,
And fain no foil fruitless hold.

To love not life, nor prize one the
That binds in gladness to your life
Thy fairest hopes—a holier lie.
And, one by one, to trust them not
Back through the years: one vivid dream
Held all thy life in sweetest thrall,
And each today one clear sharp gleam
Fell on that past, illuming all.

"It might have been," you know today,
"Was one time of joy the shining key
That would open wide the gates of life
(Oh! veil that scene of agony.)
So other states stands firm in truth
Where, shattered now, love shrine has been,
Or the same, veil, drape of earliest youth
Holds what of joy thy life has seen.

Friendship in fairest flower can spring
Even from the ashes dead and gray!
But thus no second bloom can bring
Where has once been, before a lady gayest
Was wed—and full of strange, wild pain
Had met and met—a flower poem face
In whose love and eye you see again
The unforgotten looks you trace.

Not thine, but something yet apart
From a young group now grown scattered there;
Something you claim with eye and heart
As a portion of that vanished year.
Alas! that life must often give
Thus sadness and pain for a vintage glad,
And the bitterest part of all—to live
And smile when thy heart is sore and sad.

THE STORY OF A ROSE.

"Come in here, you little rascal!" cried Dr. Packard to his little boy, who was far a boy who was peering through the picket fence at the doctor's brilliant garden. The boy was dropped trembling upon the office steps, while the big, burly doctor went about among his flowers, cutting a huge bouquet. These he gave the culprit, exclaiming, with equal sternness: "There, take that home and put it into water! Quick! Start your heels!" Then he stood upon the steps, chuckling to himself to see the bare legs of the frightened urchin fly up the street.

This garden was Dr. Packard's latest plaything and pride. "No fun in cultivating good ground; nothing to doctor!" he had said when he blasted out the scraggy, worthless limestone ledge, cropping out in his office door-yard, filled in with soil, and made the ledge gay with vigorous, blooming flowers. Roses and lilies, panzies and fuchsias, feverfews and hollyhocks, geraniums and heliotropes, phloxes and sweet-williams, verbenas and carnations, morning glories climbing over the door of his office, and sweet peas and nasturtiums winding in and out the fence—all responded to his care and blossomed with a perfection and an abundance rarely seen. Nature was in her most grateful mood.

Here it was his custom to ramble and to reward the children who were drawn to the spot by their love of flowers. He would rise up unexpectedly from behind the hedge of vines and demand, in awful tones: "Does your mother like plants? Well, take her that, you scamp," giving the boy a pink or geranium or fuchsia, and adding, in still sharper, gruffer tones, "and see to it that you bring back the pot!" If the boy was not too frightened and did not run away, leaving the pot on the doorstep, his courage was rewarded with yet another plant.

One day in June the doctor was out, walking up and down his garden paths, pulling up a weed here, picking off a faded blossom there and looking with keen pleasure at many a lovely flower, when, looking up suddenly from his bed of perpetual roses, he saw a young girl looking wistfully over the fence.

"What flowers do you like best, my child?" he asked, with a curious change from his usual brusque tone.

"Oh, roses, sir," she answered. "They are the loveliest of all. I think. We have a yellow rose that climbs up to the eaves of our house, and another white one that comes up to my window, and some pink ones out in the garden. But they live out all winter, and are not like those," she said, nodding towards the doctor's roses.

"Come in and see them," said the doctor; "and go around all you like."

The young girl thanked him and went quietly around, touching some of the flowers gently, daintily smelling the perfume of many and noticing each. But she stood longest by the rose bed. The delicate color came and went in her cheeks, and her pretty blue eyes shone with excitement and delight.

Dr. Packard watched her silently while he went from bed to bed, cutting many blossoms. These he gave to her. Her eyes opened wide with surprise. She thanked him gravely but simply, while her happy face spoke yet more eloquently. As she turned to pass out the gate, the doctor called to her:

"Wait a moment. Here, take this rose. I grew it from a seed. It won't blossom for me, perhaps it will for you. Give it a good chance. Let me see the flower when it comes. And here's a book," he continued, "that will tell you how to feed it."

Turning to go again, the girl saw a gray haired, bent man on the other side of the street, walking slowly.

"Oh, father!" she called, "see what beautiful flowers I have, and a new rose, too! The doctor gave them all to me."

Mr. Carter's pale face lighted up as he stepped across the street.

"Indeed they are beauties, my child. The doctor knew what would please you best. Let me carry the roses for you. I will get good care, sir," he added, turning to Dr. Packard.

"This is your girl, Joe!" asked the doctor.

"Yes; this is my Lucy, the last of the six," he answered, a tender, sad smile crossing his worn features.

"Better set her out in the garden. Quite too pale and thin, man. Throw away her books! Let her dig; let her make mud pies again! Keep her out of doors! Let her come in only to eat and sleep!" said Dr. Packard with a threatening scowl, quickly followed by a nod and a laugh toward Lucy.

"This will be a nice place for my rose," said Lucy to her father that evening. "I've made a little hollow right here in my own bed, so that the wind can't blow the pot over; and then, too, I won't forget to water it when close beside my mignonette and heliotrope. Three sweet flowers all in a row! Won't it be lovely when the rose blossoms, for I am sure it will; and, mother, see! I can see it the first thing in the morning right out of my own window."

Mrs. Carter sat on the porch knitting, but her eyes followed fondly the slight figure of her child as Lucy ran around from bed to bush, and the mother answered with gentle smiles the girl's enthusiastic outbursts of delight in her newest treasure. Mr. Carter drove a long stake down beside the new rose and tied it securely, while Lucy eagerly watched every movement.

"Oh! I am sure of a blossom soon, dear father; and what color do you suppose it will be? Pink or red, I hope. Red with a little white edge, just like that color best, don't we?" she asked, turning affectionately to each parent, while the pale face shone with innocent delight and anticipation.

Then she took a large bunch of the hardy roses which the modest garden grew, and, after kissing her mother, began to arrange them.

"When I am a little larger and stronger I am a good deal stronger than I was, am I not, dear mother?" she interposed, sitting up very erect for the moment. Not waiting for an answer, she went on breathlessly: "When I am older I am going to spend all my time growing flowers. You'll give me more beds, father, and I will sow the seeds and tend and water them, oh, so carefully! I'll have many, many roses out here in the garden, and then in the winter I'll have the tea and hybrid roses Dr. Packard's book tells about in the house. I can grow many of them from a few roots which I can buy for the first start, you know.

"Then I'll sell them and their blossoms. I have heard ever so many people say that they wished there was some place in the village where flowers could be bought, and Mrs. Browne, you know, sent to Boston for roses for her party. I could sell roses for such things, and make up lovely bouquets. Then I'll give all the money to you, father, and help you pay Mr. Browne the money you owe him. When I had earned enough, perhaps, I could have a little glass house here, and then I could grow more flowers, and we would live together always in this little house and be so happy, and my roses would help you both. I am sure my new rose will blossom, and with it I am going to begin helping you."

Lucy smiled to herself over the rose embowered castle in Spain, and burying her face in the cluster of roses and lilies of the valley, she inhaled the sweet perfume with a sigh of childish ecstasy. "They are like a glimpse of heaven!"

The few remaining dollars, which Lucy's father had as yet been unable to pay on their mortgage, was a source of constant worry and trouble to both her father and mother. Industrious and saving, they had always been hampered too heavily to succeed. Narrow means had always been their lot, and illness was proof their frequent guests. From a little toddling child Lucy had shown a sweet thoughtfulness for them, and had been comparation and comforter in a measure far beyond her years. She was full of childish delights and games, yet the visions of caring for her parents in the coming years were often before her and made her sedate and grave.

The summer days passed by quickly, and Lucy's rose grew luxuriantly. The tall stalks were covered with abundant foliage, but there were no blossoms. But Lucy's faith and care did not waver, and the loveliest of all, I think. We have came her father transplanted the rose into a larger pot and bro ught it into the house. Lucy daily watched and tended it, and the rose tree spread its green leaves and drank in the sunshine and the warmth all through the stormy weather, but gave no grateful response of bud or flower.

Its gentle caretaker did not thrive so. A slight cold taken in early winter could not be shaken off. The sorrowful father and mother watched her daily failing and slipping from their loving grasp. The delicate flush on the cheek deepened into a crimson, the white skin grew yet whiter, and the slender figure drooped like a faded flower. Dr. Packard visited the house daily and sadly shook his head. "Lack of vitality, Joe. Nothing to build on. Too much soul, too little body. I—I cannot save her."

But with Lucy Dr. Packard was always jolly, and made her bedside merry with cheerful bright with flowers. She confided to him her hopes, her faith in her father and her visions and plans, which grew brighter as her own sweet life ebbed away. To please her, the doctor drew a rough plan of a little greenhouse and made out a list of plants and flowers for her to begin with.

The rose tree stood in Lucy's room, and she spent hours gazing at its fresh green boughs. With the doctor's help she cut off many slips and pleased herself trying to root them in boxes of sand, calling them her rose's little children.

Slowly but surely the end came. It was a warm May morning. The chamber was filled with the song of birds and the perfume of the apple-blossoms floating in at the window. A light breeze fluttered the leaves of the rose tree. Suddenly Lucy rose up in bed, exclaiming: "Oh, father! Oh, mother! See! See the roses! Red blossoms on my own rose! My beautiful rose!" A slight gasp followed, and the sobbing parents knew that the soul of their child had blossomed into immortal beauty.

After Lucy's death life in the cottage was outwardly the same. Wearily the father went to his work, more bent and grave in aspect. Silently the mother performed her household tasks, and together they spent the summer evenings in their garden. The flowers their child had loved were remembered one by one; but the barren rose received the tenderest care. It was no luxuriant as ever, but had ceased growing almost entirely, while the rose's children, the cuttings Lucy had planted, took vigorous root, and grew so rapidly that they bade fair to outstrip the mother plant.

The autumn came at last and the roses were again sheltered in the house. No promise of buds was given, but the lonely father and mother could not part with their child's rose.

One evening in the early summer of the next year the father said with trembling lips: "Look! there are buds on our Lucy's rose!" Slowly the buds grew, and when at length the perfect rose unfolded what a glorious one it was! Deep, dark red, with leaves of richest velvet, and magnificent in size and fragrance. But after had perfected, until the rose tree was covered in radiant beauty, as if all the love and care that had been bestowed on it had turned into a garland.

Mr. Carter joyously cut some of the largest flowers to carry to Dr. Packard. As he went with them a hard featured man stopped him.

"Old, I say, Carter," said Mr. Browne, "you'll have to pay the rest of that mortgage soon. I think I've been pretty patient; it must be seven years or more that it's been running. Business is business you know, and I want the money to use."

The sight of the bunch of roses was now like a rub to the fretted man. Hot at raise the money he knew not. Blinded and benumbed, he stumbled into Dr Packard's door.

"Lucy's roses," he said brokenly, and sank into a chair and hid his face in his hands.

"These roses grow here?" demanded a hearty voice. "They are magnificent! Such color! Such form! Got any more like'em?"

"Yes," absently answered Mr. Carter; "the bush is covered with them."

"Good! I must see them!" and before the amazed father knew it he was leading the way home with Dr. Packard, and the stranger following.

"This is truly wonderful," said the stranger, who was a friend of Dr. Packard and a city florist. "I want to buy it. How much will you take for it?"

"I cannot sell my child's rose," answered the father.

"If our child were here and could speak she would be eager to sell it," said the mother, who had stood silently by. "You know her dearest wish was that her rose should help us. We love the rose for the blessed memories it brings us, but those are always ours."

"Can have several young plants of this same rose?" asked the florist.

"Yes, about twenty," replied Mr. Carter.

"Well, I'll give you $1,500 for those, and you send me all the cuttings that you can make grow, and you may keep this bush. But, understand, you are not to give away or sell a single cutting. My right is exclusive."

So it was settled. Mr. and Mrs. Carter still live in "Rose cottage," as it is called. Lucy's roses bloom everywhere in the neat door-yard. The dark-red flowers are freely given away, although not a cutting can be parted with; and never a sick room in the village but has its bouquet, carried there by

Washington Letter.

Secretaries Noble and Tracey have locked horns again for another fight, and many think the result will be the retirement of one or the other of them from the cabinet, perhaps both. To the student of politics a contest between two such men cannot fail to be very interesting, representing as they do the extremes of the republican party. Mr. Noble was selected personally by President Harrison for his present position, and has always belonged to the conservative or silk stocking wing of the republican party, while Mr. Tracey came into the cabinet as the personal representative of the craftiest politician in the country—Ex-Senator T. C. Platt, of New York—and belongs to the working wing of the republican party. President Harrison's personal inclinations are undoubtedly with Mr. Noble, but owing to his susceptibility to the influence of powerful members of his party it is doubtful which secretary he will in the end sustain. The trouble between the two gentlemen comes from the pension office, which continues to be a veritable thorn in the side of the administration. Secretary Noble has asked for the resignation of five of the prominent officials whose pensions were received under Tanner's regime. One of them happens to be a special friend of Secretary Tracey's, and that gentleman advises him to refuse to resign and promises his help to aid him in keeping his position. The result is that not only Mr. Tracey's friend but the other four officials whose resignations were asked, have refused to resign, and they, together with all the other re-rated officials have formed a combination and propose to fight for their places, and as all of them have friends—some of them big ones—Mr. Noble will find that he has undertaken a large contract. Mr. Noble in asking for the resignation of these officials was undoubtedly endeavoring to do the administration a service by trying to stave off a congressional investigation into the pension office and its methods, but it is likely to result in bringing about that very investigation.

Verily the democratic cup of joy is full almost to overflowing. Mahone and Foraker have been put on the shelf, and now comes news to the republican senators that Ingalls will probably be defeated for re-election to the senate. "Too good to be true," is the general democratic comment on the last item.

The local republicans are very much worked up over the rumor that Brown, the negro ex-Senator, is to be appointed recorder of deeds for this city. If protesting to the president will prevent, the appointment will not be made.

Honors are now easy between Senator Quay and Mr. Wannamaker, as the president has followed the Quay slate in making the rest of the Philadelphia federal appointments.

It begins to look as though President Harrison intended to pigeonhole the report of the Civil Service Commission handed him nearly a week ago. It recommends the prosecution of several office holders for violating the law against soliciting campaign contributions from office holders. The commission is anxious ly awaiting the president's decision in this matter.

The pension committee of the G. A. R. has agreed to ask congress to adopt a service pension bill that will give every man that served in the Union army in the late war at least $8 per month.

THE two-cent passenger rate law which was to be such a boon to the people of Michigan has proved the opposite. The railroads are rapidly withdrawing all special and excursion rates from Michigan points. The companies are even depriving the clergymen of their half rates.—Eaton Rapids Journal.

MAXIMILIAN'S COUNTRY.

THE IMPRESSIONS OF A GEORGIA MAN WHO VISITED IT.

The City of Mexico Has the Very Best Order—Spot Where Maximilian Was Executed—Slavish Condition of the Peons. Sweet, Seductive Native Language.

Mr. Charles H. Redding has returned from Mexico and has many things to tell. He is a close observer and a fluent talker, and his conversation on this subject is a running stream of information.

Mexico is the best policed city in the world, said he. They have 2,000 policemen and if you do anything wrong you are sure to be put in jail. But if you behave yourself like a gentleman you are as safe as in any country in the world.

You see the soldiers everywhere. Even at the little town of Aguas Calientes I saw 600 soldiers. This place, by a free translation, would be called hot springs. It is a great bathing place.

I have seen as many as fifty or one hundred people of the common class bathing at one time in the trenches that lead from the hot springs. These men and women bathe together with a costume composed exclusively of a breech clout.

I visited the place of Maximilian's execution, and stood where he was shot with his two generals, Mejia and Meramon, June 18, 1867. They wanted Maximilian to kneel and have his hands tied as a robber; but he said: "I am no robber, I am a soldier," and bared his breast to receive the fire.

Meramon, as they shot, stepped forward and received the fire advancing. Meji was an Indian general who never spared life. He stood and received the bullets like a brave man.

COMPLEX OF LABOR.

The lower class, or peons, are half-breeds, with the blood of the Spaniards and the Aztecs. I saw some of the pure Aztecs. They look like the Comanche Indians, and have broad faces, high cheek bones and enormous busts. They earn a living by raising vegetables and fruits on lands that belong to others.

The better class live well, but they are the minority. The peons are in the large majority. They are very poor, and work for eighteen to thirty seven cents a day. They all wear the same kind of clothes, a white cotton suit. The men have trousers that look like bags, and a loose cotton shirt hangs down over that.

Nature has done so much for these people in climate and soil that it makes them lazy. They take no thought of the morrow.

I talked with a good many people of the project of bringing the negroes to Mexico. I found a country with different degrees of favor. The Mexican congress passed a law allowing it, and a good many of the upper class favor it, because they think it would give them better labor. The negro is superior to the peons of Mexico. He is not only a better laborer, but I think he has more intelligence. I say that with a thorough knowledge of the negro. I was raised on a plantation where there were two or three hundred of them.

The Frenchman seems to be more popular than any other foreigner in Mexico. There are a great many of them in the capital. On the 14th of July it was French children's day, and I saw a great many houses decorated. I don't know why they should be more popular than Americans unless it is because their religion is the same as that of the Mexicans.

There is no love between the upper class, or the land owners, and the peons. The hacienadas do not own the peons, but the latter are, in fact, the worst slaves on earth—a thousand times worse slaves than we had in this country. The hacienada has an administrator who looks after the hacienda, and the administrator has several overseers under him. They all ride and wear a sword and pistol. There is none of that affection between the hacienada and the peons that used to exist between master and slave.

LIQUOR OF THE CENTURY PLANT.

I became acquainted with their national drink, pulque. It is made from the century plant. I went on a pulque farm and it is the prettiest thing in the world. The rows of plants seem to radiate in every direction like the spokes of a wheel.

The stem is cut and the pulque juice flows for six or seven months. The gatherers go through the field with leather bags on their backs and collect the liquor with gourds.

In this range when it is only a few hours old they call it "agua meja," or honey water. In that stage it is pleasant and wholesome, and I bought it whenever I could get it fresh. It has a peculiar taste and sells for a cent a glass. I frequently drink two glasses at dinner.

To make the liquor they distill it and get a disagreeable kind of whisky that is very stinging.

A great feature of Mexico is the parks, or plazas, as they call them. No matter how small the town or poor the houses they will have a beautiful plaza, and in the evening they will have bands of music and singing. I never heard a poor band while I was in Mexico.

The language is the softest and most beautiful I ever heard, and listening to them talking or singing in the plazas you would think it is a land of poetry.—Atlanta Constitution.

Restaurant Swindlers.

"Speaking of robbing schemes," said a young man whom I occasionally meet at lunch, "I've a system to beat restaurant cashiers. You see, a good many people go away without getting their change. It occurs every day. The cashier lays the coin aside in a corner of the cigar case, and when the man remembers he didn't pick up his change and comes back the cashier hands it out. I saw this happen the other day. A man paid a thirty-five cent check with half a dollar and went out. The cashier didn't notice that he hadn't picked up his change till he got to the door. Then he quietly laid it back in the cigar case. That was just as I went in. Before I got through eating the man came back and said he guessed he'd take his change.

"'What change?'

"'Why, fifteen cents change out of half a dollar after paying a thirty-five cent check.'

"The cashier handed it out. Now, he didn't remember the man enough to identify him positively, so here's my scheme. It is to form a syndicate of young fellows who look somewhat alike. Have 'em dress in the same general style and have 'em work restaurants in about thirces. For instance: Three of 'em goes into a restaurant, gets lunch for about twenty-five cents, and, coming out, one of 'em pays his check with a dollar and walks off, leaving the seventy-five cents. Then he puts his pals onto all the conversative details and one of 'em goes back after about ten minutes and asks for his change. He mentions the circumstance of paying a twenty-five cent check with a dollar, and the cashier thinks he recognizes him and hands it out. He isn't any more than well out of the place than the second man comes in and demands the same change. The cashier kicks, but the man insists and drags from some corroborative detail and is firm, and the cashier weakens and pays the amount a second time. Then the man who really did leave the change comes along and makes his front, and having all the facts and truth on his side, he is able to convince the cashier that he is really the man and that the other two must have witnessed the incident and taken advantage of it to bamboozle him. After a wrangle he gets his money—and there's the scheme. You can increase the earnings of the company by making the steal on the change of a $5 bill and only working two collections instead of three. I think of organizing about next week and the name of the profit sharing lunch syndicate. What d'ye think of it?—Chicago Mail.

New York Weekly Post.

Thoroughly earnest work is being done in behalf of tariff reform by the New York Weekly Post, which holds that the time to discuss the economic question is now, rather than in the heat of a presidential campaign. Every issue of the paper contains articles bearing upon some phase of the subject, together with questions by doubting readers, with answers by the editor, all tending to facilitate and simplify the discussion. The Post has been adopted by a number of clubs and other organizations as the best exponent of the subject, and its discussions are carried on in a spirit of fairness which entitle it to the respect of opponents as well as advocates of the revision of a war tariff to adopt it to times of peace. The Post is compiling a directory of active tariff reform organizations in the United States, and has already published one installment of the list. The Weekly Post is a 12 page paper and contains all the features requisite for a first-class general family journal. Price $1 per year.

This will be about $4,000 for Each.

Last year the Detroit Journal organized and carried out a very successful floral exhibition, for the benefit of the Detroit charities, and is now planning for another and much greater one. The musical feature alone will require the organization of a chorus of 600 voices, and the entertainment will be of the dimensions of a notable art exhibition. The chief interest, however, will center in the floral display, and in the floral booths; to be conducted by the ladies of the various charities. The Detroit Journal predicts that $100,000 net cash surplus will be cleared.

Nearly Ready.

The Detroit Journal Year Book for 1890, will be ready for issue about January 1st. It will be sent free to all old and new subscribers to the Journal. It has been thoroughly revised, and nearly all the matter it contains, as well as the cover is entirely new, the latter being beautified by an elegant flag design. It is a beauty.

A Safe Investment.

Is one which is guaranteed to bring you satisfactory results, or in case of failure, a return of purchase price. On this safe plan you can buy from our advertised druggist a bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. It is guaranteed to bring relief in every case, when used for any affection of throat, lungs or chest, such as Consumption, Inflammation of Lungs, Bronchitis, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Croup etc., etc. It is pleasant and agreeable to taste, perfectly safe, and can always be depended upon. Trial bottles free at F. G. Hines & Co.'s drug store.

Merit Wins.

We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee these every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great popularity purely on their merits.—F. G. Hines & Co., Druggists.

MOTHERS AS CHAPERONES.

WORDS OF WISDOM FOR THE PERUSAL OF GIRLS WHO ARE "OUT."

The Chaperonage Was a Spy, but a Guardian and Protector—Young and Experienced Women Need the Assistance of Some One Who Knows the World.

I would not ask, Why should a mother chaperon her daughter? but rather formulate my question into, Why should a mother not chaperon her daughter?

I fancy in the discussion of such a proposition it will be found more difficult to prove the negative, and when the subject is once properly understood it must be conceded that a mother should assuredly continue her care.

There exists no reason why she should not.

But the question becomes rather more complicated, perhaps, when the mother may have died, or when from any cause it becomes impossible for her to perform this duty.

Then the American girl asserts herself. She has been reared in an independence of thought and action which makes her dissatisfied with all restraint.

She construes chaperonage to espionage.

She declares that she will not tolerate being watched, and avers that she must be allowed entire freedom and liberty of action, and she asserts that her own perceptions of right and wrong, and her unfailing delicacy of sentiment, are all that is needed to make it safe and safe for her to go wherever she wills to do.

CHAPERONAGE NOT ESPIONAGE.

Now, this is true, and it is not true.

In the first place, it is a mistake to confound chaperonage with espionage.

To suppose that a chaperon is a spy on one's actions is a perversion of the proper functions of such an office.

A chaperon is either a mother or a selected matronly friend, whose tender interest or friendliness is the best guarantee against misconstruction.

The examination of Anderson has been concluded, and developed nothing of value, except a good-sized perjury case against Anderson. No evidence was produced sufficiently reliable to convict Anderson of burning the courthouse, or cause the arrest of any one else. As soon as discharged he was re-arrested on a charge of perjury.

A company of Chicago capitalists have purchased several hundred acres of land on the South Manitou island, Lake Michigan, for the purpose of making an insular summer resort. The company is now negotiating for control of the entire island, and without a doubt it will be successful. The north island, which is much larger and much more sparsely settled, is owned largely by S. R. Boardman, a retired Chicago lumber merchant, who lives happily there in the summer, surrounded by his family and books. In the winter his children go away to school, but Mr. Boardman hibernates there alone. He has hundreds of acres of productive soil, makes a specialty of stock raising, and has frequently 200 or more head of horses and as many cattle on the island. "Uncle Josh" Regole also has some interests there.—Detroit Journal.

W. F. Montgomery of the Manistique Sunday Sun has been knocking at the "pearly gates" on account of over work and overwork. Recuperation, but in the last issue of the Sun his physician reports a change of condition, and hopes of recovery. Montgomery has labored long and hard to establish his paper and we hope he will recover and enjoy the fruit of his toil.

Replying to the Sentinel's "box of evils" growing out of the county seat removal, the Boyne Citizens says: "As a matter of fact Charlevoix county was never in better financial stand ing than at present and Boyne City is going ahead every day." If that be true some of Boyne's prominent citizens have little regard for truth when bewailing the hard times up there. We hope the Citizen tells the truth.

The Baptist church was crowded at the Thanksgiving services last Sunday evening. The scripture lesson was read by Rev. Mr. Rood, prayer offered by Rev. Mr. McCartney, and the sermon by Rev. Mr. Ball. Mr. Ball's discourse was listened to with marked attention. He recited a multitude of excellent reasons why the people of this nation, this state, and this community should be thankful. A collection was taken for the poor, but we did not learn the amount raised.

The following is a pleasant way of punching up procrastinating patrons to pay for their paper promptly: "Guess how many p's in this paragraph, and then count them for fun; meanwhile pay patronage papers should pay promptly, for the pecuniary prospects of the press have a peculiar power in pushing forward public improvements. If the paper is promptly paid, and his pocketbook kept plethoric by his prompt paying patrons, he puts his pen to the paper in peace, and pleasant and prosperous events are in more pleasing colors, and the pursual of his paper is a pleasure to the people. Paste this piece of proverbial philosophy in some place where all persons can perceive it."

The season of navigation of 1889 was a reasonably prosperous year: although the number of vessels on the lakes has doubled and the carrying capacity has trebled in the last seven years yet there is plenty of business for all and at rates that insure reasonable profit. Whether this will continue must be a matter of speculation. Certain it is that the new steamers built in the last three or four years can afford to do business much lower rates than the older craft, and if a period of depression does come, it will be the old craft that will bear the brunt of it. The lowest rates of season, which are much heavier than last year, will be nearly 2 per cent on the lake tonnage. To replace the loss, and provide for the increased freight that is certain to follow the continued development of the northwest, is likely to require all the new tonnage that will be afloat for some time.—Cheboygan Democrat.

When the republican party leaders hold out a sop to the temperance men in their party it is always a bid for votes, and not with any serious intentions of ever enacting any laws for temperance. The local republican organ, with others in the state, copies approvingly the following from the Washington Capital: "Prohibition needs prohibiting more than civil service reform needs reforming. If prohibition isn't prohibited the republican party will be a dismantled wreck within the next ten years. The party leaders, evidently thinking prohibition a great moral feature, daily with it year after year to their own discomfiture. Prohibition is a sumptuary monstrosity and a political impossibility. * * * Prohibition can be preached, it can not be practiced. If the republican party is to die, it had better die with the jimjams than to be smothered to death ingloriously under the petticoats of prohibition."

Snow.

Mrs. Geo. Bowen is still quite ill.

Will Warden and Stella Smith took a trip to Boyne Falls on Sunday.

J. R. Vance has gone today (Tuesday) to Grand Rapids on business.

Jason Lewis killed a deer on one day recently.

Miss Annie Nowland is stopping at Geo. Bowen's for a few weeks.

Geo. Smith is quite ill with malarial fever but slightly better as last reported.

Some of our young folks took in the S. of V. ball at East Jordan on Thanksgiving evening.

Otis Smith had an attack of malarial fever but is better now. Dr. Foster in attendance.

Regular Grand Traverse blizzard for three days last week when a foot of snow fell and cutters and sleighs were lively.

Harry Hudkins cut his foot badly on Tuesday while helping Will Wing unload stave.

Joseph Cooper who is now conducting a lumbering business at Echo was seen at the mill on Tuesday night. He contemplates moving up soon.

Ironton.

Since the furnace shut down the peninsula has been swarming with men and boys, searching for game, which seems to be quite plentiful this fall.

The young people of Ironton gave Mr. Parker's folks a surprise last Tuesday evening. About 25 were present and a very pleasant evening enjoyed.

Mrs. R. Saunders went to Traverse City recently, and returned with Mr. Saunders, who has been in the asylum at that place since last spring. He is much improved in health, and his neighbors are glad to see him home again.

Stealing pigs seems to be epidemic this fall. Mr. Parker recently lost one which weighed about 125 pounds.

Miss Pearl Lenox is quite sick with cancer. We understand she is going to Detroit for treatment.

Quarterly meeting services were held at the M. E. church Saturday and Sunday, conducted by Presiding Elder Sherman. Revival services are held at the same place this week.

Boyne City.

Dec. 2.—The beautiful snow has come and the sleigh bells ring merrily, and lumbermen are happy.

Mrs. G. W. Jones is on the sick list.

Dr. Kay of Boyne Falls has moved to this town and occupies the Dr. Brown house.

Rev. and Mrs. W. R. Norton went last week to the south part of the state.

The Presbyterian church gave a Thanksgiving social in the Herron building on Thursday evening. A fine social time was enjoyed, and receipts good.

A good deal of excitement prevails in regard to the examination of Frank Anderson for the alleged burning of the courthouse, and of course various opinions are expressed, but detached bits of evidence are insufficient upon which to base our conclusions. It is hoped those wielding official power will strive to deal exact justice both to the people and to the accused.

Inwood.

Dec. 4.—M. S. Rowdish killed a pig last week, 200 days old, that weighed 210 pounds. Who will report the next?

James Cook has been quite sick, but is now better.

While trying to lead a steer recently Cash Paul and Joe Shores had as good as a "wild west show."

Tom Sinclair caught a mink in a trap in his hen-roost Tuesday morning. He has lost a number of good fowls recently.

The McGeoghan school commenced again Monday morning; Miss Hinchy teacher.

Democrats around here are all feeling "pretty good, thank you," this fall; especially since they heard from Ohio and Iowa. Just as you think you have a democrat well tripped he hobs up livelier than ever.

Considerable more snow is reported from five or six miles back in the country than we have here on the lake shore.

Advance.

ADDIE LEWIS, Teacher.

Burgess.

Dec. 4.—Joseph Lewis Jr., had the pleasure of welcoming a little stranger to his home, who came to stay 21 years.

Judge Long and wife and son, of Flint, were visiting his sister, Mrs. Edna Kane, on Saturday.

Mrs. Sheldon and family of Alanson, were visiting her mother, Mrs. I. S. Webster, last week.

Rell Long and wife and Samuel Long and family were visiting at Alanson last Thanksgiving.

A revival is in progress in the Murray district, conducted by a United Brethren minister.

Norwood.

It begins to look like winter now.

What are people going to do for water? Most all the wells are dry.

G. V. Nash went to St. Ignace last Monday.

Amos Miller, C. W. Brown, and Wm. Harris are hard at work in the club room.

Silas Clark is cutting wood for Geo. Foote,—two cords and a half a day.

New England Supper.

For Auld Lang Syne, my dear,
For Auld Lang Syne,
We'll tak' a cup of kindness yet,
For Auld Lang Syne.

The youths and maidens of the Epworth League of the M. E. church invited their friends to an old-fashioned New England supper at Bartholomew's opera hall this Friday evening, Dec. 6th.

George and Martha Washington will receive the guests and an efficient corps of waiters attired in the costumes of "long, long ago" will serve the following bill of fare:

Roast Turkey, Boiled Ham,
Cranberry Sauce,
Brown Bread, White Bread,
Pork and Beans,
Doughnuts, Tarts, Pies,
Tea, Coffee,
Etc., Etc., Etc.

Tickets 25 cents. Supper served from 6 to 9 o'clock. All come and have a merry time and a good supper.

Congregational Church.

At the Congregational Church next Sunday, morning subject—Conscience; Union temperance meeting in the evening at the M. E. church.

A SONG OF HOPE.

Sunny days are fleeting,
Happy hearts are beating,
Smiling lips repeating:
"How cheerily is this earth."
Fearing not the morrow,
Seeking not to borrow
From another's sorrow
A damper for their mirth.

But other hopes are dying,
And other hearts are sighing,
And other lips are crying
Welcome, tardy Death!
Our lot is joy and trouble;
We've gathered only stubble,
And feel the tempest's breath."

Alas! some from our ranks!
And others bright and cheerful,
But be not sad nor fearful,
For heaven is just and fair.
The miser dies for treasure,
The monarch sees no leisure,
And they who seek not pleasure
Soon find that cattle air.

And they whom life oppresses
Find heaven dearly blessed
And sorrow finds and redresses,
And all will rightly prove
For heaven's smile is over us
And heaven's love before us,
So join the mighty chorus
Of praise. For God is love.

THE OFFICE BOY.

How He May Get Promoted and How He May Get the Other Thing.

Are office boys never promoted, them? Certainly. I have known several cases, and will give a free translation of them. I wrote a note to a book house that ran after this fashion:

I want you to try as a boy Fred ——. He is plucky, means business, will not whine about promotion, will work as early and late as you wish, will hold his tongue, and will earn $5 for every one you pay him. He will be content with $5 a week.

I received this reply in substance:

I have no vacancy for the boys, but such a boy as you mention will always pay for twice over. If you dare stand by it, send him along. I shall keep your independence in my reference.

Fred reported for work the next morning. He began at the bottom, sweeping, dusting, cleaning up, taking away books, carrying off waste paper, etc. In a short time the store looked as it never did before. He was the first there in the morning and the last at night. He never asked what to do next, but found something to do until new work was assigned. He kept his mouth shut, his eyes and ears open, and his feet and thoughts active. The fifth week they raised him to $5 and gave him work above four other youths whom he found there. At the end of four months he was raised to $12 a week without asking it.

Ben went from the high school into an office at $5 a week. They told him plainly that there was no probability of promotion, as no boy had been promoted for twelve years, but there was a possibility. There was nothing about him that was promising. He had not stood high in school, was not a good penman, was not strong physically; but he went to work with the full determination that he would "get there."

A few days after the senior member of the firm saw him going to the postoffice, and was so delighted with his evident intent to boom the business that he said to his associates: "I wish there was some way to label Ben 'This boy is from the home of ——.' It is worth something to have such an exhibition of business on the street."

In the course of a few months another boy was secured, and Ben was given $6, until, in less than three years, he was having $20 a week, making a place for himself by the way he did everything. In those three years a thousand other boys in Boston had changed from place to place, and were still working for $5 or $4 a week.

The boy who is merely an office boy will never be promoted, neither will he who is above being an office boy; who is lazy, indifferent, careless, sulky, moody, mediocre, envious, jealous, afraid of doing more than his share, and bound not to earn more than he is paid for. He will be promoted who makes himself equal to every emergency; who loves work, learns how to work, how to be cheerful and loyal, lending a hand everywhere; who puts nothing into his work who lets his "head save his heels;" who will write anywhere, at any time, at any thing, without complaint.—A. W. Erwin ship in Golden Rule.

THE Endorsers of the Camel.

Admiral D. D. Porter, who once went to North Africa to secure camels for introduction into America, said in a recent interview: "In their campaigns against Algiers, the French were surprised to see their camels, although reduced to skeleton, making forced marches with their loads. Mules in their condition could not have carried even their saddles. A camel's flesh is as good as beef. You can hardly tell one meat from the other. Camel's milk is very good, as I can testify, because I used it in my coffee. A camel generally drinks once in three days, and besides his four stomachs he carries a sort of reservoir in which he stores water. I have been told that even ten days after the death of a camel that reservoir can be opened and ten or fifteen pints of clear, drinkable water taken from it.

"On one occasion six camels carried 2,645 pounds of oats and made the journey in much quicker time than two wagons, each drawn by six mules, and together carrying about the same weight of load. On a very heavy road a caravan of our camels carried from San Antonio nearly two tons of oats, making about twenty miles a day. The Texas people were such that wagons could not have been used at all. I believe this is an experiment worth trying again. The camel would not only make a valuable adjunct to our army in the northwest and west, but I believe the day is coming in which he will be domesticated as a beast of burden all through the southern and middle regions of this country."

Not Much of a Sight, After All.

"I saw a golden calf made of bone,"
"Pshaw! I saw a tumbler made of glass and blood last night."
"Where?"
"At the circus."—Harper's Bazar.

A BOWERY FAKE SHOW.

The Way in Which the Guileless Stranger Is Sometimes Taken In.

"Why don't the newspapers get after some of those fake shows on the Bowery?" asked a policeman stationed near Chatham square yesterday of a reporter. "I was stopped two days ago," continued the officer, "while going my rounds by a man who said his name was Smith, and that he was the president of an agricultural college somewhere down south. He was very much excited, and said that he had just had a narrow escape from being robbed in a dime museum. I asked him for the particulars and he gave them to me as follows:

"'I was passing along the Bowery,' said our southern friend, 'when my attention was attracted by the sound of an organette before a museum, whose front was posted over with glaring posters, covered with pictures of an enormous fat woman, a two-headed lamb, a negro said to be changing his colors, etc., presenting a very taking picture to the eye.

"'Having nothing special to do I thought I would while away the time by taking a look at the show. So paying my ten cents I was led in to see the sights. The first thing I saw was the two-headed lamb. It was stuffed, and looked mightily like a clumsy attempt to fasten two lambs heads upon one body. Even if the two heads had originally grown there, it was not much of a thing to see. I looked around next to find the fat woman. Not seeing her, I asked of a man, who was following me around, and who seemed to be in charge, where the fat woman was. 'She has just gone out,' said he. 'And the negro who is changing his color?' 'He was sick today and didn't come down.'

"'I now saw I was sold,' continued Mr. Smith, "and was on the point of coming out when I noticed a man behind me step up to some sort of an instrument and blow into it. 'He's testing his lungs,' said the man who had told me about the absence of the fat woman, seeing that I displayed a little interest in the operation.

"'Now step up and try your lung power,' said my informer. I told him that I didn't care anything about it, but, as he seemed so persistent, to get rid of him I blew into the machine. While I was doing so he took out a card and filled it out with a lead pencil and gave it to the first man, who hurriedly took it and trust a quarter into the man's hand. He then hastily took out another card, filled it out and passed it to me, saying, 'Here is the record of your lungs. A quarter, please.' In reply I told him I did not want his card and didn't intend to give him any quarter, either.

"'Why, you saw this man give me a quarter for testing his lungs, and you can't expect me to test yours for nothing, do you?' said the man angrily. Which he was growing quite red in the face. I looked at the man who had given the quarter, and at a glance I saw he was the ticket seller at the entrance to the show. I knew now that I had a set of sharpers to deal with, and determined to put on a bold front. So clipping my hand into my hip pocket as if I had a pistol there I said:

"'If you look at that card you'll find that my lung power is good, and if you'll come another step nearer you will find that my ability to take care of myself is equally good.' While I was speaking I gradually worked my way to the door, and before they could recover from their surprise at my bluff I had opened it and was out on the street.

"I honestly believe," continued Mr. Smith, "that those men intended to rob me, and would have done so if I had shown the white feather."

"After Mr. Smith told me his story," continued the policeman, "I asked him if he wanted to make a complaint against the show people, but he said that he did not, as he did not care to have his name appear in the papers, and thus have his friends learn that he had been to such a place.

"That's the way with people," said the policeman, "they will never complain against the folks who try to swindle them, and the latter know it, and are all the bolder in consequence."

The reporter himself afterward went into this show, saw the stuffed lamb, learned that the fat woman was still out and that the negro had not yet recovered from his sickness; but, owing to the fact that there were others in the room beside the show people, he didn't get a chance to have his lungs tested.—New York News.

Goddard's Marks.

We have previously told several good stories of Col. John Goddard, who was a king among the Penobscot lumbermen in his day. The Dexter Gazette tells more. Goddard sent large crews into the woods every year. As soon as he had hired his man he started him off for the scene of operations. He always furnished transportation, together with food and lodging while on the way. He treated the men through, as it were. Upon the back of each he scrawled a few chalk marks, and a man bearing that superscription was entitled to all the privileges the stage line or hotel could furnish. The company settled the tariff and paid the score. Furthermore, no man was received by the woods boss unless he showed a third about and show Goddard's bold chirography in the vicinity of his spinal column.—Lewiston Journal.

Due to Nasal Difficulties.

A Dutch physician declares that a close connection exists between the exercise of mental faculties and disorders of the nose. He says that, if it were generally known how many cases of chronic headache, of inability to learn or to perform mental work, were due to chronic disease of the nose, many of them would be easily cured.—New York Telegram.

A Daily Paper FOR 1 Cent a Day.

A daily newspaper now costs but little more than the old-time weekly. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an impartial, independent newspaper. It is a member of the Associated Press. It prints all the news and sells it for 1 cent a day. Mailed, postpaid, for $3.00 per year, or 25 cents per month. This is $3.00 per year less than the price of any other Chicago morning paper. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is not a blanket-sheet. It is a condensed paper. You can read it and still have time left for an honest day's work. It is a daily paper for busy people. No one who has the advantage of a daily main service need longer be content with a weekly newspaper. The circulation of the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is, with a single exception, the largest in the United States. It exceeds that of all other Chicago dailies combined. You ought to read a daily paper. Asked in musing mood.
Order, said the law court;
Knowledge, said the school;
Truth, said the wise man;
Pleasure, said the fool;
Love, said the maiden;
Honor, said the page;
Freedom, said the peasant;
Home, said his age;
Fame, said the soldier;
Equity, the seer;—
Peace, they heart full sadly;
"The answer is not here."

Then within my bosom
Softly this I heard:
"Each heart holds the secret: Kindness is the word."

—John Boyle O'Reilly.

A NOBLE FAILURE.

From an open window in a small, neat cottage, there came, one summer evening, a melody played by no unskillful hand. It was so soft and mournful that a few hearers, who had stopped just outside the fence, were very still as if afraid of missing a note; and they talked in whisper only.

"How sad it is! They sad to-night."

"Yes; sadder than usual."

"Poor lad! It's such a pity."

One of them who had seemed more deeply touched by the sweet tones than the others, stood very thoughtful for a little, then left the group and opened the gate. No sooner had the latch clicked behind him than they ceased, and walked to the open door his hands were tightly clasped between two others, and a soft voice exclaimed:

"Oh, it's you, Hal. I'm so glad."

"Hush! I don't want to see you, Ted!" asked Hal, laying a hand affectionately on the other's shoulder.

"My ears are very quick. I knew you by the way you opened the gate, and your step. It is such a kind provision that when we lose one sense the others grow sharper. Lend me to the window, Hal; I've something to tell you."

The blind boy spoke the last words very sadly, and the other, knowing by it that he was to hear some serious trouble, led him, with compassionate tenderness, to an easy chair by the window.

Two years before, by an accidental explosion of powder, an impenetrable veil of darkness had been drawn between Ted's eyes and the manifold beauties of earth, blotting out bright hopes and fair prospects of a happy and successful future. The blow was dreadful to such a lad as he—so merry, so active, so promising.

Hal Goodwin was just Ted's age—seventeen—a healthy, strong-limbed fellow—with a heart as big as his body. The two had been fast friends, but when Ted became a helpless object of pity Hal's friendship rose to a strong, controlling affection. He could not be reconciled to his friend's "hard luck," as he called it.

"Now, what is it?" asked Hal, as they were seated by the window.

"Don't worry you, or tire you, Hal, with my complaining," responded the blind boy, feeling about for his friend's hand.

"Worry me," exclaimed Hal, closely grasping the groping hand. "Don't talk like that. I'm sure I'm the worried if I thought you didn't tell me all your troubles. What am I good for if not to straighten out your difficulties, and try to be eyes for you? Dear knows, they're blind enough, I'm afraid of worrying me or asking me too much."

"You're as kind, Hal."

"Nonsense, I wish I was."

"Why, Hal," began Ted, "since father was charged, and all the other men at the shop, it has gone pretty hard with us. You know we bought the organ on instalments. It's about half paid for, but father wasn't able to pay the last instalment, and has been kindly given him time. But now another one is due next Saturday, and we cannot ask him to wait any longer."

"How much is due?" asked Hal, with evident meaning.

But Ted detected it and hastened to say:

"No, no, Hal, you mustn't pay for it, for you've done more already for me than you could, and besides, you told me your father had cut down your spending money. I've made up my mind what to do. I was you to have the money to come for the organ."

"Part with the organ," cried Hal in astonishment. Why, what in the world would you do without it, Ted?"

"Please stop and listen for me, Hal," said Ted, laying his head on his friend's shoulder, "I tried to write to—for I don't father or Lucy to know what I'm doing—but I lifted the pen and couldn't find the place where I used to give it to you. No, don't try to change my mind, Hal. I've thought it all out, and it'll hurt me to pay you back. I can learn to knit or make baskets, or plait straw for chairs, or something, which will be better than playing the organ. I think I can—I can learn to do without you, Hal, or pretend to do it better."

Knowing how completely lost Ted would be without the organ; how it was his only companion in his solitude and how great a help it had been since the accident, Hal gently endeavored to dissuade him, but finding it only pained him he sat down to the table to write. "Let me rest my head on the arm so that there Ted's pathetic attempt to write—all blurred and unreadable.

"What day shall I tell him to come for it?" asked Hal, taking up the pen.

"Thursday," replied Ted. "No, Friday, Hal. I'd—I'd like to have two days with it, Hal.

"That's right," said Ted, approvingly. "Now, please mail it to-night and promise me you won't say anything about it to father and Lucy."

Hal hesitated a moment, then promised.

"Now tell me about your bicycle race," said Ted. "When you are going and all about it."

This was opening a fresh wound for Hal's enthusiasm was unnoticed, and he sat down quietly so as not to interrupt him. He playing his farewell to his pleasure, and it was mournful and manifested to clearly the unspeakable pain of parting with the instrument, that he could scarcely restrain the impulse to exclaim: "Ted, it must not be; I must spare you this loss." But presently the blind lad ceased—his fingers lovingly across the keys without sounding them; then softly, sadly and resolutely, he closed the lid and with a sigh came to leave the room.

Hal sprang up, grasping his hand and exclaimed:

"Ted, I'm so sorry; but maybe we can save it yet. I'll try."

"No, no, Hal," responded Ted, "you must not. Let it go now. I've—I've made up my mind to part from it."

Just then Lucy entered, saying it was time to go to the station, and they hurriedly led Ted from the room. Hal was to accompany them to the train that was to take them to the picnic.

"I'll sit all the afternoon by the road where the train is to be, and Lucy will tell me how far you are ahead of the others, Hal," said Ted, his face lighting up with pleasant anticipations. "I'll bet you to win so much."

Lucy looked gratefully at Hal, with glistening eyes, as if to say, "You are so kind to provide this pleasure;" then thinking he might not understand her, said with a blush: "Don't fail in the race; Ted has set heart so on your winning."

And Hal, with a troubled look on his face, answered, "I'll do my best," and hurried away.

That afternoon Lucy found a pleasant, shady seat under a large tree by the road in the woods, and there she and Ted waited for the bicycle race. Many others had come there also. On one side of the road were Hal's admirers; on the other those of his rival; the eagerly peering eyes. Nearer still in sense, and like, had, the blind lad, motionless, and with a bright wheel glittering like a shower of nectars.

The sudden cheer, the signal of victory, did not arise. There was surprised silence, for the rider wore the uniform of the city club.

But here came another cloud of dust, rapidly gaining on the first.

"This must be Goodwin," murmured Hal's followers.

"This must be Banks," muttered the others.

But the glittering steel flew quietly but swiftly by, and it was neither.

Then they waited in breathless dread and shame for Hal. Could he be so far behind? What was wrong? But the yellow dust soon slowly settled down on the sultry road and he did not come.

"Where's your great champion now?" cried Banks' friends.

"He's flunked; the baby," was the sullen reply.

"He's fallen and hurt himself," said Ted, apprehensively.

"I hope not," said Lucy, and she felt that she was pale, and was half glad for once that Ted could not see.

"Why! Whenever I get do something for you that's wrong, it seems to turn out worth it. It just falls flat."

But they wouldn't let him talk that way long. Ted's mother, saw the impulse of her gratitude, stopped him with a rousing kiss, and Lucy looked as if she wished she could take part in just such an interruption.

You may be sure the story spread through the village on the wings of the wind. And it was surprising how quick the word "coward" died away.

Ted was soon at work in the city music store, and, despite his sore affliction, is doing well, and there is every prospect of his one day becoming partner.—Yankee Blade.

Eating Snails.

The stories about Frenchmen eating snails are believed by many people to have no foundation in fact, but to be only a phase of the exaggeration in which Yankees are apt to indulge, in describing the queer things that are to be found on Parisian dining tables. Nevertheless it is a fact that nearly 100,000 pounds of snails are sold daily in the Paris markets to be eaten by dwellers in the city, and a large proportion of the purpose in extensive snail gardens in the suburbs and on the arrondissements are made their flavor fine. One snailery in Dijon is said to bring in to its proprietor 7,000 francs a year. Many Swiss cantons also contain large snail gardens where they are grown with much pains. They are not only regarded as a great delicacy, but are reckoned as very nutritious. Frenchmen are now extensively used as an article of food in Austria, Spain, Italy and Egypt and the countries on the African side of the Mediterranean. Indeed, the habit of eating snails as food has existed in various parts of Europe for many centuries.—Good Housekeeping.

Tariff Notes.

Here's a straw. The cotton mills of New England, which have been importing raw material unburdened by the tariff and with the world for a market, were never so prosperous as last year. They averaged 9.35 per cent dividends on the capital, besides thousands spent in repairs and improvements, while the woolen industry, burdened by an exorbitant tariff on raw material, limiting the market to one nation, has been never so much harrassed, discouraged or unprofitable—Cheboygan Democrat.

The Pennsylvania protectionists kick very vigorously against the demand of the New England manufacturers for free coal and iron. They are especially wroth at the demand for free iron, and are calling the New Englanders all sorts of belittling epithets, such as "pot metal men" and the like. They are deeply concerned for the Pennsylvania working man, who will be ruined, they fear, if English pig iron—the product of "pauper labor"—is let in free. But they do not seem to have anything to say about the fact that a prominent iron company in the Keystone state has sold a thousand tons of pig iron to parties in Liverpool. Perhaps it is as well that they do not say anything. One is puzzled to imagine what they could say that would fit the occasion and relieve them of the necessity of publishing the most eloquent words and beautiful theories. Yet it is safe to say that when the tariff comes up in Congress this winter, Pennsylvania republicans—we mean protectionists—will oppose tooth and nail any reduction of the duty on pig iron.—Free Press.

New York Weekly Post.

Thoroughly earnest work is being done in the cause of tariff reform by the New York Weekly Post, which holds that the time to discuss the economic question is now, rather than in the heat of a presidential campaign. Every issue of the journal contains articles bearing upon some phase of the subject, together with questions by doubting readers, with answers by the editor, all tending to facilitate and simplify the discussion. The Post has been adopted by a number of clubs and other organizations as the best exponent of the subject, and its discussions are carried on in a spirit of fairness which entitle it to the respect of opponents as well as advocates of the revision of the tariff to adopt it to these ends. The Post is compiling a directory of active tariff reform organizations in the United States, and has already published one installment of the list. The Weekly Post is a 12-page paper and contains all the features requisite for a first-class general family journal. Price $1 per year.

The "Poor Man's Friend."

[The following letter was intended for last week, but was unavoidably omitted.]

EDITOR JOURNAL,—Enclosed find $1 to pay my subscription to your paper. The article on the first page entitled "Are you Getting what you Voted For?" I consider alone worth the year's subscription.

Allow me to say just here: They are getting just what they voted for. They voted for Harrison and they are getting him. Like others that got deceived, they are already sick of him. What better proof do we want than the result of the elections? Where is the poor man's friend? He is not to be found. The poor man is forgotten. But never mind; Harrison will have another ax to grind in a little less than three years. We think he will not find so many willing ones to turn for him as he did one year ago. * * * What would people think if Michigan happened to elect a democratic governor next fall. We are more liable to than Iowa was, or Ohio. They did and rejoice over it; so do we. Farmers, wake up! Demand your rights! * * * High tariff, they say, is not a tax. The heaviest tax is laid on the necessaries of life, such as the poor people are obliged to have, and the prices of everything that the farmer has to sell is going down. down! I am sorry that the presidential election is so far away. Farmers will be so poor by '92 that it will be a hard struggle for them to recover. Still Harrison claims, or did claim, to be the poor man's friend, but since election we have not heard the poor man mentioned.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

[THE JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the towns in this county. Let us hear from you often. Give us all the news in as brief and concise manner as possible. Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach us no later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality.]

Eveline.

Dec. 8.—The rain of Sunday has about whipped our snow.

Earnest Warner, who has been here on a visit to his uncle, D. M. Gregory, for the past five weeks, expects to return to his home in Topeka, Kan., next Monday.

The new store building of I. G. Waldron is rapidly nearing completion, and will soon be ready to occupy. It is his intention to stock it with groceries, provisions, dry goods, etc. as soon as completed.

We understand there is some talk of an organization of a reading circle in Ironton. This would be a good thing and we hope the organization will not be a failure.

We noticed in the last issue of the JOURNAL that Norwood has the champion "wood chopper,"—two and a half cords a day. Look out for a challenge from here Mr. Clark.

It is reported that the Arm was frozen partly over above Ironton last week.

Very quiet since the boats have laid up for the season.

We have it on good authority that another small steamer will plow the waters of Pine Lake and South Arm next spring. She will be 26 feet keel and 8 feet beam, and will be propelled by a three-horse engine. She will be used principally for fishing, and will be ready for business as soon as navigation opens in the spring.

Mr. A. B. Steel of Advance wishes us to state that since the trial of the courthouse fire, "Carlo" Steel has become disgusted with the vegfiet and has withdrawn from the detective force.

Boyne City.

Dec. 10.—Jessie Shay while working in the woods last week was struck on the head by a falling limb and although he was bruised somewhat and lost some blood, yet he escaped without serious injury.

Mat Cunningham has rented the Mears' mill at Boyne Falls and will conduct business for himself hereafter. He will continue to reside in Boyne City however, for a time at least.

The trial of E. H. Shepard, for the alleged slander of Samuel B. Thatcher took place before Justice Barbour at East Jordan, Monday. The jury was out but a few minutes, bringing in the verdict of "not guilty," which verdict met with general approval, the opinion being often expressed by reliable citizens that in this case the prosecution was nothing less than persecution. The Prosecuting Attorney, however, in this case labored hard for conviction, manifesting a zeal worthy a better cause.—it would have satisfied even the fish warden.

Query, Would it, under the Harrison regime, be sufficient cause for removal from office, if the postmaster, in his postoffice, assailed one of its patrons with opprobrious epithets and vituperative language simply because in a court of justice he had answered questions as required by his oath?

Wilson.

Cool and windy.

Our sleighing is nearly gone and the roads are quite icy.

Elder Scofield preached at Afton last Sunday evening, but on account of the storm, but few attended

Meb. Ben Healey and families from this place also some Saints from Hipp's and Dwight's went over to Bennett's school house in Echo where on Sunday Mr. Sheldon held forth to a crowded house.

J. R. Vance came home from Grand Rapids on Thursday. While there he got some improvements for the mill also a small stock of groceries and a few dry goods. Afton is booming a little.

Mrs. Marion Hulkins was on the sick list last week. Harry is getting better so as to be around again. Miss Allie Delong Sundayed with them.

Geo. Smith, an old resident of this township, died of malarial fever on Tuesday morning, Dec. 10th, after three weeks illness. He leaves a father, brother and sisters, also three children (who are now doubly orphaned) to mourn his loss. They have the sympathy of all in this deep affliction.

We learn that Elder Bryant, formerly pastor of the Presbyterian church at East Jordan, and a resident there, died of typhoid fever on Sunday evening, after an illness of two weeks. He was much loved and respected by all and will be greatly missed by his people as well as by relatives and friends. He leaves a wife and two sons to mourn.

Advance.

Dec. 9.—L. E. Phillips moved into town last week.

Edwin Hayden, from the south part of the state, is stopping with his brother Sidney this winter.

Inwood.

Dec. 11.—Farmers who throw away their ashes would make a profit by sowing them on their fields as a fertilizer.

Jacob Vandensen killed a spring pig last week that weighed 275 lbs.

Another baby at Robert Trimble's.

Amos Noyes and wife of Ironton visited his sisters at Norwood last week.

Raising good colts is one of the easiest methods for the farmer to lift the mortgage from his place.

Mr. Myers of Smithson's has engaged with Mr. Roe of the Fox islands to run the shingle business on the islands.

Ed Martindale and Miss Cora Denton, of Norwood, were married at Petoskey last Thursday.

Dr. Thad Lewis of Norwood and Miss Laura Pearl of Banks were married Dec. 11th at the residence of the bride's parents. Relatives and friends from Charlevoix were in attendance. After dinner the young couple were escorted to their new home in Norwood, where the doctor had everything in readiness to begin housekeeping. May they enjoy long life and prosperity.

Pleasant Valley.

Dec. 10.—Work in Beech's lumber camp is about completed until sleighing comes, so the teams can begin hauling to the mill.

Mr. Parrish, from Dwight's, has put up shanties on the Len Phillips forty, from which he will cut the logs and beach them at Boyne City.

N. W. Burdick Sundayed at Advance (or thereabouts).

Van R. Newville recently purchased a fine cow.

Silas Demmings' baby is quite sick.

The Pleasant Valley Educational Club meets at the school house Thursday evening of each week. The first Thursday of each month a paper is read, and an editor for the next month chosen. Fred Newville is the editor this month. The officers of the club for this month are: President, Mabel Newville; vice president, Perley V. Burdick; secretary, Aylia H. Burdick.

Remarkable Rescue.

Mrs. Michael Curtain, Plainfield, Ill., makes the statement that she caught cold, which settled on her lungs; she was treated for a month by her family physician, but grew worse. He told her she was a hopeless victim of consumption and that no medicine could cure her. Her druggist suggested Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption; she bought a bottle and to her delight found herself benefited from first dose. She continued its use and after taking ten bottles, found herself sound and well, now does her own housework and is as well as she ever was. —Free trial bottles of this Great Discovery at F. G. Hines & Co.'s drug store, large bottles 50c. and $1.00. 2

PRINTERS' INK.

A JOURNAL FOR ADVERTISERS

PRINTERS' INK is just what it purports to be, "a journal for advertisers." It is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—the trade journal, so to speak—of American advertisers. It tells the leading and inexperienced advertiser in plain, comprehensive articles how, when, and where to advertise; how to write an advertisement; how to display one; what newspapers are the best media to use; how much to expend—in fact, discusses on every point that should of profitable discussion. If you advertise at all, PRINTERS' INK can help you. Perhaps you expend but ten dollars a year in advertising; if so, PRINTERS' INK may show you how to double the service you are now getting for one-half the money. A year's subscription costs but Five Dollars; a sample copy costs but Five Cents. Advertising is an art practiced by many but understood by few. The endeavor of PRINTERS' INK is to understand it thoroughly. Purely their advice, based on an experience of more than twenty-five years, will help you. Address, as above,

THE LAST CRUISE.

On the day when I landed at Annobon, one of the natives particularly attracted my attention. He was a man past middle age, his woolly hair sprinkled with gray. He was of commanding stature and very erect. He spoke excellent English, and his conversation showed that he possessed some advantages of education which placed him far above the plane of his semi-barbarous fellow islanders.

His history had been an eventful one. When he was 18 years old the captain of a British vessel had taken him to London, where the ship's owner gave him employment as a porter in his warehouse. The boy, who was bright and active, received the name Albert Johnson; he became a favorite, and one of the clerks taught him to read and write. He remained five years in London, and then returned to his island home.

As I looked through the open doorway of his dwelling, before which we stood while he told me the story of his early life, I saw what I at first thought was an idol, but a second glance showed it to be the figure head of a vessel.

It had represented, in high relief, a female clothed in a flowing robe, with one arm folded across the breast and the other pointed upward. The lower limbs were broken, the hand of the uplifted arm was missing, and a portion of the nose was gone. There was little left of the gilding that once embellished it, but the lines were gracefully drawn, and it had evidently been executed by an artist in wood of no mean pretensions.

"What ship did that belong to?" I asked.

"That was the figurehead of a schooner that was lost on the island many years ago," Johnson replied. "It's a long story and a sad one, too," he continued, as he gazed wistfully toward the mutilated figurehead.

He hesitated a moment, and then motioned me to a seat upon a palm log which served the purpose of a bench in front of his hut. He seated himself by my side, lighted his pipe and told me this story:

"One morning, just after sunrise, in October, 1847, about a year after my return from England, a sail was seen standing in toward the island from the eastward. Soon afterward one of our people, who had climbed to the top of a cocoanut tree to have a look, sung out to us that it was a small schooner. The wind was fair and she came along at a lively rate until she was quite close, when she clewed up her topgallant and gaff topsail, threw her topsail shack and lay to not above four cable lengths from the beach.

"A beautiful craft she was; her long, black hull lay low in the water; her masts, tall and tapering, lift they looked not bigger than this pipe stem, raked way aft; they weren't stuck forward as if they wanted to tumble over the bow, as is the fashion nowadays. Her rigging was as trim as any man-of-war's, and there was a crowd of men on her deck.

"'A slaver,' said I.

"'Yes,' said my father, who stood at my side, 'and she's got her cargo aboard, too.'

"As he spoke, a boat was lowered from the schooner, and pulled for the shore. A tall, longfaced man, whom I took for a Yankee, and who was evidently one of the mates, sat in the stern sheets. When the boat touched the sand, the crew sprang out, while the mate rose to his feet, and looking at our people, who stood in a great crowd on the beach, said in Portuguese: 'Who's king here?'

"All looked toward my father, and moved back a little, leaving him standing almost alone a foot or so in front of the others.

"'We have no king in Annobon,' said my father; 'what do you want?'

"'Ha!' and he ripped out a big oath, 'I've heard of you Annobon niggers,' he replied; 'what we want is water.'

"'How much water do you want?' asked my father.

"'Enough for our crew and passengers.'

"'Passengers!' exclaimed my father, making believe he was astonished, though he knew all the time what the mate meant.

"'Yes, passengers; we have a lot of gentlemen and ladies aboard there, who who have taken passage on board our schooner for the Brazils, and we hain't got enough water to last 'em the voyage.'

"My father hesitated, and then said, 'I'll go on board and see the captain. I s'pose you ain't him?'

"'No,' was the reply, 'I'm second mate of the craft.'

"My father stepped into a canoe, beckoned to me and half a dozen others, and we pushed off toward the schooner, my father calling out to our people in their own language not to leave the beach until he came back. Passing under the schooner's stern to get around on the starboard, I read her name, Celine, of Bordeaux.

"At the starboard gangway stood a small, slender built man whom we found to be the captain. He wasn't more than five feet and a half high, and his face was as smooth as a woman's; he had a large nose and light gray eyes. Dressed in a blue cloth jacket with white duck trousers, and a jaunty little cap on the side of his head, he looked more like a smart young naval officer than the captain of a slaver.

"As we drew alongside he sung out to us not to come on board, and asked in Portuguese, which he spoke with a French accent: 'Is the chief in that canoe?'

"'You can speak to me,' replied my father; 'what do you want?'

"'I want water for my schooner, and I want you natives to help my men get it on board. Where is the best place to anchor?'

"The decisive manner in which the little captain spoke made it clear that he would have his way, and my father agreed to help fill the water casks. But he asked how it was that the vessel on her way across the Atlantic came to Annobon, 300 miles off the coast of Africa, without a supply of water.

"The captain then told us that as his vessel had lain in a lagoon near the mouth of the river Lage, with only part of her water on board, an English man-of-war, a brig, had been sighted, and he had been obliged to ship the 'cattle,' as he called the poor creatures in the hold, and run for it, leaving behind over a hundred of the 'cattle' in the barracoon.

"He slipped out of the lagoon at night, and just before the day broke there fell a calm, with the 'infernal' brig, as he called her, not more than four miles away. He expected that she would attempt to capture him with her boats, but in this emergency a light breze came off the land, and the brig being to leeward he managed to crawl off, keeping away to the southward with the breeze hoisted.

"The brig stood after him with all the canvas she could swing, and she sailed so fast as to worry the captain of the Celine, who had never before met anything he couldn't run out of sight in four or five hours. But when the sun went down a fresh topgallant breeze was blowing from the northeast, and the brig was seen from the masthead just a speck on the horizon.

"He stood on his course until midnight, then kept dead before the wind two hours, and then hauled away on the other tack to the south'ard and west'ard. At daylight nothing was to be seen of the brig, and he shaped his course for the island.

"The schooner had been drifting a little since she first hove to, and my father told the captain that he was in so good a place to anchor as he could find. The captain then gave the order to clew up the topsail, the anchor was let go, and the craft swung with the tide very handy to the watering place.

"'Send two men aloft, Mr. Silva,' we heard the captain say to the first mate, 'and mind they keep a good lookout to seaward.'

"My father having agreed to help with our canoes to tow the water casks from the beach, hoisting tackle was got out, a raft of six casks was dropped over the side, and, towed by two of the slaver's boats, was soon making good headway toward the mouth of the fresh water creek.

"The party was in charge of the second mate, and hearing him speak to one of the crew in English, I addressed him in the same language, which seemed to surprise him. He told me he was born in America, in Maine, I think he called the place. He talked a good deal, and from him I learned much about the schooner and her people.

"He said she was of 170 tons burden, had been built only about a year and a half, and had just got back from a trip to Cuba, where she had landed nearly 400 slaves in good condition. They now had 200 slaves on board, and had intended to take on a hundred more, but the English brig had scared them off.

"One hundred and seventy of these slaves were men, and the rest were women, with the exception of two boys, five or six years old. One woman, he said, had a young baby.

"The crew numbered forty-two, all told. The captain, he said, was a Frenchman from Marseilles, named Giavoli, the smartest sailor and the most daring fellow he had ever been shipmates with. All these particulars turned out to be important.

"My father told me he should like to have the slaves detained as long as possible, as it might happen that the English brig or some other man-of-war would come along. He had sent one of our people part way up the mountain above the town to keep a lookout, and he felt sure he would see a sail.

"It was past 9 o'clock before the first raft of filled water casks was alongside the schooner. The water was pumped from them into empty casks in the lower hold.

"The poor black people between decks kept up their cries, praying to be let out. Only a few of them were allowed on the schooner's deck, but I could see from the canoe that a sentinel with a musket on his shoulder, and a cutlass stuck in his belt, stood all the time by each of the hatchways ready to shove down any slave who should succeed in reaching the deck.

"The boat was unpressive; the wind had died away and the air was heavy. A little after noon a light breeze sprang up from seaward, and with it came a heavy swell that made it difficult to tow the casks filled with water from the beach to the slaver.

"It was perhaps 2 o'clock when, just as we were about to push off from the watering place, the man whom my father had sent up on the mountain side to keep a lookout came running along the beach and spoke to him. My father, who was with our people helping the slaver's men to fill the casks from the creek, said to me, in our language, 'He says there is a sail in sight.'

"We had got within about three ships lengths of the slaver when we heard the voice of the captain singing out to Mr. Smith, the second mate, to let go the casks and hurry on board. I looked aloft and saw that the recall signal was hoisted, and when I turned my head over my shoulder toward the shore I could see the men getting into the boat and starting to pull off. Two hands ran aloft on the Celine forward, and soon loosened the top-gallant sail and topsail, which had been furled when she dropped anchor.

"As the mate let go the casks he cast off the line by which our two canoes were towing, and the one I was in paddled alongside the schooner.

"The vessel's crew were working lively, I can tell you. There was a gang at the windlass and the anchor had already broken ground; the topsail was hoisted and ready to be sheeted home, the schooner swung with the wind, and a man took the wheel just as we got abreast of the gangway.

"The little Frenchman was walking the poop furiously, looking toward the shore from which the boat was coming, then out to sea. When he saw our canoe he took hold of the main rigging with one hand and leaning over the rail said, in a low voice, like a hiss: 'How close in can I go to there?' pointing to the large, high rocks that we call the sail rocks, at the northeast end of the island.

"'With a steady breeze you can run in so you can throw a biscuit ashore,' said I.

"'There is plenty of water there, but when the tide is running you want to allow for it.'

"'Where he asked, very sharply, if I was a pilot.

"'No,' I replied; 'but why so much haste, captain?'

"He cursed me and yelled: 'You ask why I hurry—look yonder!'

"As he spoke he pointed seaward. Coming down before the wind, with royals and stun's'ls set, was a vessel. She was not more than six miles away, and we no doubt the English man-of-war brig. It was the sail my father had told me of as I was leaving the beach.

"The second mate's boat was hoisted, and when the flying jib was set the topsail and topgallant sail were sheeted home, and the schooner began to move slowly through the water, but not so fast but that the other boat, which was now alongside, was hooked on and hoisted up, the crew clambering out by the main chains and on to the deck.

"Capt. Giavoli had got somewhat cooled down, and was giving his orders in a clear and quiet tone. The fore and main sheets were slacked off, the gaff topsail set, and the slaver headed a little west of north, with the wind abeam, a course that took her along the east end of the island and at a right angle to the course steered by the brig.

"We paddled to the shore as fast as we could, and had just reached the beach and turned to have a look at the chase, when what should we see but the brig, which had now come quite near, headed up into the wind.

"Her yards were alive with men, and what but a moment before had been a beautiful, trim pile of canvas from deck to trucks was now a mass of flapping sails and flying cordage. Everthing had been clewed up and let go, and the crew were trying to hand the sails, though they flopped so loud that they sounded like a volley of muskets to us on shore.

"I looked over to the schooner, but she was holding on to everything, though she keeled over so far that her lee rail was under water, and her yards were hanging on the weather rigging and the rails like so many flies on a ceiling.

"The wind now began to come in gusts and the air grew cold, and it chilled me as the fog used to do in London. There was a dash of rain, and it got so thick that we could not see either vessel.

"There was a flash, then a crash of thunder, and it lightened for a moment. Then we saw that the slaver had taken in her jib, his topsails, and sail, and his gaff topsail and was setting away his topsail, and a crowd of men were crawling up the rattlines to reef it, though how they could expect to hand the sail in such a gale I could not understand.

"The brig, under close reef topsails, was standing away from the island and steering nearly south. Her yards were squared, and then I saw that the wind had shifted round to the southwest. We had shifted round to the southwest, and that the slaver was close hauled and dipping her low sides pretty deep, too, for all she must be buried every plunge she made.

"Then came another squall of wind and rain, and the air grew almost as black as night.

"'The wind is heading him off,' my father cried, placing his voice close to my ear. 'She will never get past the rocks.'

"Again there was a flash that almost blinded us, a crash that seemed as if the world had come to an end. Then the air lighted up so that we could see the poor Celine. Her mainmast was gone and had carried with it the foretopmast. I thought I could see the men that had been on the topsail yard struggling with the wreckage to leward, but there was little time to think of them. The craft was not a ship's length from the sail rocks, and heading right betwen them.

"A great sea came rushing down on us. Oh! I shut my eyes. There was a crash, then we heard above the roar of the storm.

"There was another volley of wind, of rain, of light, of thunder. Then it closed again. The wind blew a steady gale, and the rain fell more regularly. We could see the rocks and the ocean, but that was all. The slaver had disappeared and the brig was not in sight.

"The gale continued until the sun went down, but with the rising of the moon, which was as its full, it subsided, and by 9 o'clock in the evening the sky was as clear and the stars shone out as steady and bright as if all the world was at peace and all its people happy.

"The storm had done much damage on the island. More than half our huts had been blown down, a number of the canoes had been dashed to pieces on the beach, and many of our finest cocoanut trees were lying upon the ground.

"All that night our people spent in going back and forth upon the beach, and many a terrible sight they saw. With the flood tide, which began to turn a little before midnight, the bodies of the black people and of the slaver's crew came floating in with the wreckage of the vessel. We looked for some signs of life among them, but all in vain.

"About 3 o'clock in the morning one of our people found the body of the captain. His heart still beat and he breathed faintly, but he died before we got him upon the beach. He had a frightful gash in his forehead and both legs were broken.

"Just after the finding of the captain I came across the body of a woman with a baby in her arms. The little thing had its face against her breast, and when I felt it I found that it was warm. I took it up and gave it to my wife, who carried it to our hut. She rubbed it and held it by the fire and in a few moments it gave a low moan, then opened its eyes and began to cry.

"My wife and I took good care of the little thing; it was a boy, and we brought it up. You saw him on board your ship this morning. Surf Johnson, for so I christened him, and that figure-head you see in there, are all that is left to remind us of the Celine, of Bordeaux.

"The next day we buried the bodies of ninety-eight persons, black and white, that were washed ashore. The rest were swallowed up by great Father Ocean, and, as the Good Book says, we shall never see them till the judgment day.

"We heard afterward that the brig rode out the storm and reached Sierra Leone in safety."—W. A. Boyce in Youth's Companion.

NOTICE OF ATTACHMENT.—State of Michigan, In the Circuit Court for the County of Charlevoix.

The Charlevoix Savings Bank, Plaintiff, vs. David C. Nettleton, Defendant.

Notice is hereby given that on the third day of October, A. D. 1889, a writ of attachment issued out of the Circuit Court for the County of Charlevoix aforesaid, in the suit of the Charlevoix Savings Bank, a corporation, plaintiff and doing a general banking business at Charlevoix, Michigan and by virtue, thereof, the sum of $300.00 besides the above named plaintiff, against the goods, tenements, lands, and chattels belonging to said David C. Nettleton, the defendant above named, for the sum of one thousand, six hundred and eighty three and 50-100 dollars, ($1,683.50), which said writ was returnable on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1889, was duly served by me, backed by virtue of said writ, and said debt, duty and costs could not be found, and was not personally served with said writ.

Dated this 27th day of November, A. D. 1889.

FRED W. McNAIR, Deputy for A. D. CRUICKSHANK, Circuit Court Commissioner, Charlevoix, Michigan.

First publication Nov. 28, 1889.

MORTGAGE SALE.—Default having been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage made and executed by John Stanley and Jessie Stanley, his wife, to The Charlevoix Savings Bank of Charlevoix, Michigan, in Indiana, dated the 3rd day of December, 1887, and recorded in Liber 5 of mortgages, on page 500 of Charlevoix County Records, on which mortgage there is now claimed to be due and unpaid at the date of this notice the sum of Twenty Dollars and seven dollars, principal and interest; and no suit or proceeding having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof. Now therefore, by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and of the statute in such case made and provided, notice is hereby given that said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale at public vendue, to the highest bidder, at the front door of the court house in the village of Boyne City, in said County of Charlevoix, on the premises described in said mortgage, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount due on said mortgage, with interest and costs of sale, which said premises are situated in said County of Charlevoix and are described as follows, to wit: All that certain tract or parcel of land situate in the township of Boyne, in the county of Charlevoix and state of Michigan, to wit: The south east quarter of the south west quarter of section fourteen in township thirty-four north of range five west, containing forty acres, (40 ha.) here or less, according to United Sales survey.

The Standard of the Magazine is high. Its spirit progressive.

The illustrations are interesting and of the best.

There is not space here to give even a summary of the features to appear next year, but among other things there will be a New Department and Additional Pages, and groups of illustrated articles will be devoted to the following subjects:

African Exploration and Travel.
Life on a Modern Man-of-War (articles).
Homes in the City, Suburb, and Country.
Practical Papers on Household Building Associations.
Electric Motors.
Electricity in the Household.
Etiquette, the Inventor, by his Authorized Biographer.
Hunting.
Famous Artists, American and Foreign.

There will be 3 serials.

Robert Louis Stevenson will contribute in 1890.

Each subject, and there will be a great variety this year, will be treated by writers most competent to deal with it, and will be up to date. Readers who are interested are urged to send for a prospectus.

Tariff Notes.

Muskegon News: In the Harrison campaign the republicans promised the farmers "a home market," but in eight months this year the value of farm products shipped abroad for lack of a market at home is $48,000,000 greater than the exports of farm products during the eight corresponding months last year. This ought not to convince any farmer that he is worse off this year than last, but it ought to give him a correct opinion of the value of "home market" campaign clap trap.

The funny St. Louis Globe-Democrat says that the tariff was not an issue in Ohio or Iowa, but it was in the Dakotas, Washington and Montana. It is a little curious that the tariff should be a leading issue in every election the republicans carry and not at all an issue in any election that the democrats carry. Senator Allison said at Dubuque the night before the election: "The issues this year are the same as last year. If there were good reasons why the republican party should succeed last year the same reasons should hold good this year. Our opponents say in their platform and on the stump that the protective tariff is wrong. The vote in Iowa will be taken as an instruction to its representatives in congress."

Washington, D. C., National Democrat: The protectionists are manifesting an unwarranted amount of pleasure over the resolutions adopted by the National Farmers' Congress in Montgomery, Ala., last week. The first resolution is that "while Congress maintains the policy of a protective tariff we demand that all farm produce shall be as fully protected as the more favored of the manufacturing industries." If the protectionists can get any comfort out of that they are capable of being warmed by Colonel Sellers' own and original combination of tallow dip and isinglass. The resolution shows very plainly that the farmers are observing the difference between their treatment and that the protected interests receive, and we do not believe that the protected interests really take any comfort out of this fact. As farm products are but little imported, and to a large extent are exported it is a manifest impossibility that they should be "as fully protected as the more favored manufacturing industries." The demand of an impossibility as the condition of the agricultural support of the protective tariff is not a guarantee of the long survival of the latter. But we hope the woolen manufacturers will notice the ingenuity with which Farmer Lawrence, late first controller, who framed the resolutions, managed to insinuate that while coats are necessities carpets are luxuries, the duty on the cheap, coarse wools used for carpet making should be higher than the fine and expensive wools used for clothing. This is really the neatest thing that we have seen in the literature of the wool tariff. It is a notification to the manufacturers that they can get no concessions from the republican sheep owners.

Washington Letter.

Sergeant-at Arms Leedom, of the house of representatives has the sympathy of everybody here in the misfortune that overtook him just as he was preparing to turn his office over to Mr. Holmes, his newly elected republican successor. C. E. Silcott who has been cashier of Mr. Leedom's office for six years and who has handled during that time more than $30,000,000 has turned thief and absconded with about $75,000 of somebody else's money. Whose money, and who will have to bear the loss is as yet a very fine legal problem. The money was drawn from the treasury by Silcott on salary receipts signed by members of house of representatives and the treasury officials claim that the men who signed the receipts will have to stand the loss, while the representatives are generally of the opinion that the loss should fall on the government, and that the government will have to take its chances of recovering the money from Mr. Leedom. Several treasury experts are now assisting a committee of the house to investigate the books of the sergeant-at-arms. As soon as their report is made the house will take some action. Gambling and women were the cause of Silcott's ruin. He is supposed to be in Canada.

The nomination of Judge D. J. Brewer, of Kansas, to be associate justice of the supreme court was a complete surprise to everyone here, except the Kansas senators. It was hardly a welcome surprise either to many of the republicans. The fact that Judge Brower is a rampant prohibitionist adds nothing to the popularity of his nomination. There is no opposition to his confirmation, which will probably be pushed right through.

No official notice of the death of Jefferson Davis was taken here, notwithstanding his having once been secretary of war, and quite a sensation was created in some quarters because a lady living several squares from the capitol, saw fit to drape the front of her house in mourning.

Senator Voorhees is "loaded for bear" on the the tariff question. He offered a preamble and resolution in the senate setting forth the fact that all existing tariff taxes on foreign merchandise should be so revised, repealed or amended as to provide, First, for the collection of a sufficient revenue to pay the expenses of the government, economically administered, the principal and interest of the public debt as they fall due, and liberal pensions, but not a dollar more; second, for the taxation of all articles of luxury at the highest practicable rates, and for the reduction of taxes on all necessaries of civilized life to the lowest possible rates consistent with a tariff for revenue only; third for the curtailment and overthrow as far as possible of all monopolies in trade by the enlargement of the free list. Mr. Voorhees gave notice that he would at some future time call up the resolution and address the senate thereon. His speeches are always worth listening to.

A deluge of federal election bills have already been introduced in the senate. It is safe to predict that none of them will ever pass the house.

Speaker Reed has announced the house committee on rules, accounts and enrolled bills. It is not thought that the complete list of committees will be completed before the holiday recess. The democratic members of the committee on rules are ex Speakers Carlisle and Randall.

The civil service law seems in a fair way to catch it from both parties in the senate. Senator Vance has introduced a bill for its repeal, and Senator Paddock one removing the railway mail service from its jurisdiction. Both gentlemen state that the law is a humbug, and that its strict enforcement would be directly in opposition to our whole system of government. When two men usually as far apart as these two agree, there is food for thought in the subject of of agreement.

Ex-Speaker Carlisle takes back his old place of democratic leader on the floor of the house, with as much ease and grace as he laid it down to accept the speakership. No man ever had a stronger hold on his party associates in congress than Mr. Carlisle has.

Eupepsy.

This is what you ought to have, in fact, you must have it, to fully enjoy life. Thousands are searching for it daily, and mourning because they find it not. Thousands upon thousands of dollars are spent annually by our people in the hope that they may attain this boon. And yet it may be had by all. We guarantee that Electric Bitters, if used according to directions and the use persisted in, will bring you good digestion and oust the demon dyspepsia and install instead eupepsy. We recommend Electric Bitters for dyspepsia and all diseases of liver, stomach, and kidneys. Sold at 50c. and $1 per bottle, by F. G. Hines and Co., druggists. 4

A Scrap of Paper Saves Her Life.

It was just an ordinary scrap of wrapping paper, but it saved her life. She was in the last stages of consumption, told by her physicians that she was incurable and could live only a short time; she weighed less than seventy pounds. On a piece of wrapping paper she read Dr. King's New discovery, and got a sample bottle; it helped her, she bought a large bottle, it helped her more, bought another, and grew better fast, continued its use and is now strong, healthy, rosy, plump, weighing 140 pounds. For fuller particulars send stamp to W. H. Cole, druggist, Fort Smith. Trial bottles of this wonderful discovery free at F. G. Hines & Co's drug store.

Masks and Faces.

Go to Emma Todd's novelty store for your masks for the masquerade next week.

Latest Railroad News.

Engineer McVean and Assistant Northrup of the C. & W. M. were in Charlevoix Tuesday examining the grade of the D. C. & E. at this place, and in company with Engineer Beardslee and Secretary Eaton of the latter road, have driven to Bellaire over the proposed line. This action is significant, and supports the theory assumed by the JOURNAL last August, that the C. & W. M. would go to Mackinaw from Bellaire via the D. C. & E. survey. This theory has been common rumor since and though occasionally denied, every movement seems to support it.

In Grand Rapids Tuesday afternoon, a gentlemen somewhat familiar with Mr. Mulliken's ideas and methods stated to the JOURNAL that the Traverse City extension of the C. & W. M. was the finest piece of road building done in Michigan during the year; that Mr. Mulliken built as near as possible in a straight line for the purpose of competing in speed and time for the through passenger traffic; that when he reached the straits he would undoubtedly compete for the east-bound through traffic from the north; and that the passenger traffic of Charlevoix was of far more value than the difference in local freight over a line east of Pine Lake. There is abundant reason to believe that this plan will be adopted, and the road completed through Charlevoix next summer.

For Christmas.

Five hundred men, women and children wanted to buy Christmas goods at Emma Todd's. A large assortment of elegant plush goods, books, cards, toys, sleighs, etc. Dolls by the hundreds. A fine line of handkerchiefs and hosiery. Everything in the line of novelties. Call and examine.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

[THE JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns in which it is not represented. Give us all the news in as brief and concise manner as possible. Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach us no later than Wednesday evening. Two correspondents at Boyne City's correspondence are regularly and punctually.]

Inwood.

Dec. 19.—Tom Sinclair cut the ends of his fingers off last week in a cutting box while cutting straw.

Chester Denton has just found the bones of a yearling steer which he lost in the spring.

William Harris and O. D. Wood went to the eastern part of the county to see about constructing a bridge or ferry across Bear Lake.

Chester Denton is cutting the underbrush from 25 acres of land for a fallow next summer.

Nash has all his logs skidded and is ready for snow.

The Hilton school is doing finely under the instruction of Miss Gladdys Jefferies.

Dr. Perry visited O. D. Hilton last week.

The young folks of Norwood surprised Dr. Lewis the night after his marriage, and left him a fine center table. Every body reported a good time.

Henry Superman, foreman of Nash's mill in Banks, informed us that the mill will commence running next week and will continue night and day.

Ed Cook came home from the woods but will return as soon as the snow comes.

Edwin Cook will go to Elk Rapids with a grist next week.

O. D. Wood has bought a large gray horse of Willis Miller and will match his gray stallion. Harmon Wilson will drive the team this winter in Nash's employ.

Alfred Vandeusen is digging a well and will erect a wind-mill to water his stock. He has also enclosed his barnyard with a high board fence to keep out dogs and protect his stock. Mr. Vandeusen is preparing to breed a high grade of Percheron horses and Holstein cattle. He also has about 60 sheep in good order, and a thoroughbred Shropshire ram which he bought at the state fair last fall. His barns are of generous size, and well arranged for the comfort of stock and economy of feeding. It will do unnecessary farmers good to call on Mr. Vandeusen for pointers.

Stella Smith has had a severe attack of quinsy for the past week, but is slightly better at press ut.

Elder Grover has arrived to look after the welfare of his flock here. He expects to go to Clam Lake at Christmas and hold meeting.

Some of the members of the Smith family met at Geo. Smith's late residence one day last week appraising personal property.

Saints meeting of about four hours duration at Sedgeman school house Sunday. Several parties from Echo and other places were present.

Joseph Warden will soon have help in his lumbering business as a twelve-pound boy arrived at Paradise Hill on Sunday morning.

After school pupils neither absent or tardy during the month ending Dec. 13th: Pruelle Scofield, Mildred Hudkins, Mary Antenburg and Earl Vance. Kate Wilson, Teacher.

As Joseph Cooper was riding from East Jordan to his camp in Echo with James Cox on Saturday evening they ran off a bridge over a creek, the forward wheels of the buggy came off, sending Joe through the dash board while James landed on his head in the creek. No serious injury was done except to the buggy. Moral, go home before dark from town on Saturday night.

Boyne City.

Dec. 16.—A. P. Heasley, county clerk, has moved into Wm. White's house on Lake street.

Both the Methodist and Presbyterian churches will celebrate Christmas eve by decorating Christmas trees in their respective churches. An especial effort will be made to please the children and an enjoyable time for all is anticipated.

Miss Sadie Jones will start for Lansing on Wednesday the 18th, where she will spend the winter with relatives.

Married, at the photograph gallery of A. E. Martin in Boyne City, on Monday, Dec. 16th, by A. E. Martin, justice of the peace, Arthur E. Eaton and Miss Augusta Martin, both of Wilson.

The stewards of the M. E. church gave the first oyster supper of the season at the Crane building on Friday evening, Dec. 13; also a short literary program. It was liberally patronized and all spent a very pleasant evening.

We are sorry to say that an addition has been built to the U. S. Hotel for a saloon and billiard hall. How long must the nation suffer and the people mourn before citizens will know that "righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to any people."

FROM BETHLEHEM TO NAZARETH.

THE WISE MEN OF THE EAST.

From out the golden doors of dawn
The wise men came, of wondrous thought,
Who knew the stars. From far spoke
The sheikhs of the desert
Their costly gifts for Bethlehem
Wafts, aloes, incense from their precious Filled
Their sweets of flower fields, their sweet
Distinctness of soul-moved hearts
They had, low bending at his feet,
As reapers bend above their sheaves—
As strong sward reapers bending, classmates,
To give their gathered full sheaves kneeling thus
And, kneeling so, they spake of when
God walked his garden's fragrant sod,
Yet had his face from them,
Or yet had man forgotten God.
They spoke. But Mary kept her thought apart
And, silent, "pondered all things in her heart."
They spoke, in whispers long, they had
Their hungry heads together, drew
Some stained scrolls breathless forth, then made
Such speech as only wise men knew—
Their high red cassocks on the hays hill set
Outstanding, like some night-born silhouette.

MORN AT NAZARETH.

I think I see Him now a child
Before the burst of sudden day,
Above the silver fields of corn
Where He has gone apart to pray;
I think I see Him leaning thoughtful down
Beyond the corn, beyond the waking town,
Beyond the silver's mists that rise
From all sight save the sky's in the corn.
The mists have dainty in the skies,
The skies have dainty in the corn,
While all the world is full of earnest care
To make the fair world still more wondrous fair—
More lordly fair; the stately morn
Moves down her aisles of golden wheat,
Her guards of honor gill the corn
In golden glory for God's sake.
Her purpled hills also crowns in crowns of gold
And majesty to the Lord of Light —Joaquin Miller in Independent.

TWO CHRISTMAS EVES.

At the corner of the market square in the ancient town of St. Ives, Cornwall, there stands a picturesque old hostelry called the "Golden Lion." Until quite lately it had for its near neighbor an inn equally picturesque, and perhaps even older—the "George and Dragon." Both these ancient houses of entertainment must have witnessed many strange events, besides being the scene of many a joyful drinking bout after the gathering in of the "harvest of the sea," or at the less lawful landing of a contraband cargo, or at the end of a successful privateering expedition. For all these things your Cornishman hath an excellent relish. On the spot was the pulpitum of the liberties of St. Ives, for here stood the whipping post, the cage and the stocks.

The George and Dragon must have been the fashionable hotel for after the Cornish pilgrimage of grace the abbot's commissioner, Sir Ambrose Trevanion, lodged here, and entertained at dinner the portreve of St. Ives, whose worship is much politely hanged in the market square for his treasonable practices. Here, also, the Duke of Bolton, member for the borough town in 1699, "was treated with six bottles of sack." The two houses stood so close together—being divided only by the narrow street leading into the market square—that the occupants could walk each other good morning from the window.

In the days of George II Peter Hexel was landlord of the George and Dragon, and John Benowden was host of the Golden Lion. They were not only neighbors, but fast friends. There was, perhaps, something in the similarity of the circumstances of these two men that strengthened their friendship. They were both widowers, and each had an only child. Richard Hexel was a handsome, strapping fellow of twenty-twenty. Mary Benowden was nineteen, and the pride of her father's heart. As children they had played together; but there came a time when they only looked and smiled and nodded to each other from the opposite windows. Then Richard would watch for Mary when she went out, and would follow her to the fields or on the seashore; and as it came to be at length another evening for old, old story, which surprised nobody—least of all, the landlords of the George and Dragon and the Golden Lion, who looked forward to the time when the interests of both these establishments should become one and indivisible.

But there was one person who watched the growing affection of the lovers with a bitter and jealous eye. This person could not be a true love story, according to the ancient and regular pattern, had there been nothing to interrupt its smooth and even course. A certain Thomas Chapmyre, the son of a miller in the neighboring parish of Zennor, had long looked with longing eyes on Mary Benowden. His suits were discouraged by the host of the Golden Lion, and Mary herself made it very plain that she disliked his attentions. Nothing could exceed the bitterness of his feelings when Chapmyre found that he was rejected in favor of one who had been his successful rival from boyhood. Richard Hexel had "taken him down" at school—in the wrestling bouts at "Frastardly" and Hurling matches on the "Cornish hug," and had constantly snatched the victory from him in the game of "hurling." All these defeats he had endured with comparative indifference, but to be beaten in the game of love was not so easy to bear. He watched the lovers in their walks, till he felt he could do anything short of murder to get his rival out of the way. He thought if Hexel were once removed from the scene he might yet succeed with Mary, trusting to time and the chapter of accidents. About this time the government declared war against Spain, and it was certain that men would be wanted for the navy.

If the king's ships could not be manned by other means, the press gangs would be out, and they would first of all try their luck at the seaports. What if they should visit St. Ives? It was not unlikely—and they would be glad of a hint where good men were to be found. Thomas Chapmyre turned this matter over in his mind till he persuaded himself that he would be doing good service to the state, and furthering his own interests at the same time, if he could lend a helping hand in manning the navy, provided, always, he could himself keep out of the way, for he had no desire to serve his country on board a man-of-war. He was full of such thoughts when he made one of his periodical journeys to Falmouth on mining business, and sought out a certain "crimp" or agent for entrapping seamen for the press-gang. What he did there, or what arguments he used to enhance his plans, we do not know; but the "crimp" was richer by some pounds at the termination of the interview.

It was Christmas eve, and the good people of St. Ives were preparing to keep the festival with due honor. The usual excitement of the season had been increased in the course of the afternoon by the appearance of a ship-of-war, which anchored in the bay, and it was expected that some of the officers and crew would come ashore to join in the general merrymaking. After dark a band of mummers entered the market square, and, stopping in front of the George and Dragon, commenced the performance of the Christmas drama of "St. George." Soon a large crowd was collected, and the mind brought to the doors and windows of the houses most of the persons who were within, including the frequenters of a little club which met at the George and Dragon and the Golden Lion alternately.

In the midst of a terrific combat between St. George and the Turkish knight there was a commotion among the crowd, and a party of armed sailors appeared, headed by a tall fellow, who, flourishing a naked cutlass, cried, "In the king's name!" The crowd at once broke right and left, and the screams of women and cries of "The press! the press!" The sailors made a dash at some of the younger men in the crowd, and among those they secured was Richard Hexel, who was standing at his father's door. The party then retreated with their captives, closely followed by the crowd, crying, "Down with the press gang! Down with them!" More than once the sailors were so hard pressed that those in the rear had to turn and make a stand in the narrow streets, and a serious conflict was imminent when they reached their boats with the men they had captured, and at daylight next morning the sloop of war in the bay had disappeared.

That night there was much wailing among the women of St. Ives, and a fruitful subject of talk was afforded to the club at the George and Dragon. Among the members of this club were Capt. Trewithn, a retired officer of the navy, who had sailed with Admiral Benbow, and had lost a leg in the service of his country; Mr. Matthews, repemaker and mayor of St. Ives; old Will Nance, who had once been a smuggler, and who was a great favorite with the boys, and had been knocked out in some encounter with revenue officers; and, lastly, John Tackbaird, the town barber, who, though occupying a lower social position, was allowed to mingle after business hours with the men whose wigs he dressed in the morning. But the barber was in advance of his time, and his opinions which Capt. Trewithn and the mayor thought little less than treasonable. John Tackbaird was, in fact, a Democrat; and on the present occasion he was loud in his denunciation of the press gang, which he said was contrary to Magna Charta and the bill of rights—a tyrannical and unconstitutional violation of the liberty of the subject, and showed the English to be a nation of downtrodden slaves, writhing under the iron heel of despotism.

"Where," said he, waving a newspaper in his hand, "where are our boasted liberties, when the birelings of a corrupt government can thrust themselves into our houses and carry off our sons and brothers, and force them to fight in the unholy quarrels of kings and their unprincipled ministers? How long are we to be chained to the chariot wheels of a bloodthirsty oligarchy? How long—

"Tut, tut!" interposed Capt. Trewithn with warmth. "Stop the palaver, John Tackbaird. The king must have men for his ships."

"Men for his ships, Capt. Trewithn!" retorted the barber; "the king get them by fair and honest means, and then he will protect them and see that those who work in the mines, including the frequenters of a little club which met at the George and Dragon and the Golden Lion alternately, protected in their homes. Men! Why, my dear, they don't want

A Delayed Issue.

Saturday morning.

C. J. Strang, editor, has been confined to his room most of the time since Wednesday, which will explain the delay in the publication of the JOURNAL this week.

Postmaster General John Wanamaker favors the JOURNAL with a copy of his annual report of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

The Sentinel is mistaken in its estimate of the Charlevoix "Tariff Reform Club" of 1888. A majority of its members did not favor "free trade" but all were in favor of reducing tariff taxes to the actual needs of the government,—they were "tariff reformers."

The proceedings of the Michigan Press Association held at Grand Rapids last July have just been received from the press of the Bellevue Gazette. The book contains an elegant steel portrait of President Brearley and photo plates of Vice President Powers, Secretary Perry, and Treasurer Sellers. The book is a credit to Mr. Perry's workmanship.

My dear tax-payer, when you get your tax receipts gathered together, and wonder why those bits of paper cost so much, just stop and consider who is managing the finances of this great and glorious commonwealth. A republican ring manages the state finances, a republican ring which includes the now famous "big four" is running the county finances, and a young and vigorous republican ring have had things pretty much their own way in township and village government the past year. A majority of you demanded this thing by your votes; now take your medicine patiently and don't complain.

Washington Letter.

The McKinley tariff bill will probably be the proper name for the measure the republican members of the ways and means committee will try to formulate on that most trouble-some subject, the tariff. It is entirely too early to attempt to make a prediction as to what the new bill will be. Some people think the bill will be based on the senate tariff bill of the last session. Your correspondent does not think so. The senate bill of last year was a vote-catching hodge-podge of absurdities hurriedly thrown together by order of certain republican bosses, and would never have passed the senate had not those who voted for it known that it was certain to be defeated in the house. The new bill will be constructed in a more leisurely way and will consequently be a better measure—it could hardly be worse.

The Largest Book Published.

The latest edition of Webster's Unabridged, in the quantity of matter it contains, is believed to be the largest volume published. It will surprise many to know that by printers' careful reckoning it contains eight times the amount of matter that is in the Bible, being sufficient to make 75 12 mo. volumes such as usually sell for $1.25 each. But the best thing about the book is that no space is wasted. It is crammed with useful knowledge for every person who has learned to read.

Webster's Unabridged Illustrated.

Viewed as a whole, we are confident that no other living language has a dictionary which so fully and faithfully sets forth its present condition as this last edition of Webster does that of our spoken and written English tongue.—Harper's Magazine.

FROM WOOD TO TIN PLATE.

ADVANCES MADE IN A GENERATION BY DAIRY FARMING.

Tinned Plate Is Made in South Wales Only—Its Effect, Therefore, It Is a Raw Material to the United States—The Tariff Thereon Is Nonsense.

People of middle age can well remember the old wooden and earthenware utensils used in dairy farming thirty years ago. The cows were milked into a small wooden pitcher, and then the milk was passed through a hair strainer with wooden sides. Then the milk found its next resting place in large, coal, earthenware pans, where it remained until the cream came to its surface.

As soon as this happened the skimmed milk was given to the calves for food, while the cream was turned into butter or cheese. Everything was hard work in those good old days. There was much scalding dairy utensils, and everything had to be kept scrupulously clean. But all this was before the introduction of tinned plate for general use.

Tinned plate contains very little tin. The body of tinned plate is now composed of the finest Pessemer or Siemens-Martin steel. Formerly, it was made of sheet iron. These steel sheets are first rolled out of bar steel and afterward dipped in pure melted tin. Then the tin is thoroughly incorporated by means of acids with the surface of the steel sheets, and the sheets, consisting of 95 per cent. of steel and 5 per cent. of pure tin, are polished, cut in squares and packed in wooden boxes.

There is apparently only one place in the world where the operation of making tinned plates can be carried out on a profitable basis. Even at that place it is a very poor business. There are no more miserable wage earners in Great Britain than the South Wales tinned-plate workers. But the process is largely one carried out by simple hand labor. In one sense the work is unskilled, but, like the manufacture of horseshoe nails, it seems to run in families. The entire cost of making and packing tinned plate in Wales is only 3 cents a pound. In the United States the steel plates alone would cost 4 cents a pound without the additional cost of tinning.

Nothing ever struck the American people as being so useful as tinned plate. It could be turned into pots and pans and light saucepans. It made a convenient nutmeg grater, and a still more convenient spice box. It drove out the clumsy wooden dairy utensils used in dairy work. It found a place on roof tops to keep out the rain. No other nation could have found the innumerable uses for tinned plate that this country has done, but then no other people have our practical inventive powers.

When tinned ware began to be extensively used in dairy work, it created a revolution in this industry. For the first time it became possible to transport fresh milk to points distant from the dairy. It is not so many years back since the milk supply of New York city was obtained from dairy farms within walking distance. Now a procession of milk trains, from points eighty to a hundred miles distant, each morning roll into the railroad stations around and in the city.

Tinned plate utensils are not so easily kept clean as glazed crockery ware, but then the tinned plate vessels are not broken so easily as crockery ware. But tinned plate is much cleaner for dairy purposes than the wooden ware which it drove out.

No tinned plate is made in the United States. To all intents and purposes tinned plate is a raw material as it reaches our shores. As a raw material it gives rise to many very large industries. The canned goods industry had its rise and enormous development in the cheap tin wrappers which could be put around meats and fruits to preserve them, and which could be afterwards thrown away as practically valueless. The size of this trade may be inferred from the fact that 630,000,000 tinned cans are used in it every year.

The petroleum refiners are also large users of tinned plate. Last year they took 192,500,000 110-pound boxes of tinned plate. But nearly one-third of the total quantity of tin imported into this country is used in dairy farming.

In all these industries it is important that the raw wrapping material should be as cheap as possible. Every one would grumble if they had to pay half a cent to the United States government on every piece of paper with which they wrapped up a parcel. If it was in war time or with an empty treasury, it would not so much matter. But in time of peace, with overflowing coffers, it would soon be intolerable.

Yet every tomato can pays half a cent duty to the government through the tariff on tinned plate. Every forty-quart milk can has in like manner paid duty to the amount of thirty cents. Thirty cents is not much in itself, but when it is found that fully $2,500,000 is paid every year in duties on tinned plate which goes to make dairy utensils, the effect ought to be startling.

Farmers are slow to realize their share of this tax. But let each dairy farmer who reads these lines go around his farm and count up all the half cents he has given unnecessarily to the government, then all the cents on larger articles, finishing up with thirty cents on his forty quart milk cans. When he has done this let him add them up and figure out what he could do with the money if it was in his pocket where it ought to be.

In the first eight months of 1888, thirty-five woolen mills failed, with liabilities of $2,500,000. In the first eight months of the present year forty-six woolen mills failed, with liabilities of $7,000,000. There were two causes for these failures. One was bad management; the other that, instead of depending on themselves, the manufacturers depended on protection. Protection helped them to overproduce, and ruined them when they tried to interest in outside markets.

TARIFF NOTES.

Between 1870 and 1880 the woolen mills in this country decreased by 875.

In 1867 there were 88,000,000 sheep east of the Mississippi river; now there are 18,000,000. More protection, less sheep.

A good story was recently told to a Harvard audience by William Lloyd Garrison. "When I was in London lately," said he, "like every other American I went and ordered some suits of clothes. As my money was not protected, the tailor was very glad to take it in exchange for his clothes. Not only that, but he solicited my patronage after I should return to America. I replied that I thought the duty would make the importation price prohibitory. 'Not at all,' said the tailor. 'You see, I send you two invoices: one to show to the custom house, and the other to pay me by.'"

Men who carry the very moderate house rents which Europeans pay, in comparison with the inhabitants of the United States, forget the effect of the tariff in enhancing the cost of the materials. If a man wants to use imported marble in building his house, he has to pay 50 per cent. advance on it to the treasury. The lumber for his house is taxed $2 per 1,000 feet. Screw nails and hinges get off with a modest 40 per cent. each. Paint costs 3 cents a pound additional for tariff taxes. Slates are admitted to this country after paying 20 per cent. ad valorem. Common window glass has to pay as high as 86.13 per cent. of its value. In this way the cost of a house is made to reach a very handsome sum.

The old leaden statue question has turned up in New York again in somewhat different guise. Messrs. Tiffany & Co. imported a lot of bronze statues and statuettes from Europe. As objects of art those were dutiable at a rate of 10 per cent. The collector, however, classed them as manufactures of copper and promptly "assessed" them with a duty of 45 per cent. Tiffany & Co. appealed to the circuit court of the United States, which gave judgment in their favor. The collector carried the matter to the supreme court of the United States. The supreme court promptly wanted to know who cast the statues, mechanics or artists? "Mechanics, from the designs of artists," said Tiffany. "Then," said the supreme court, with great solemnity, "they must be manufactures of copper, and, therefore, the rate is 45 per cent."

Curiosities of the Tariff.

When a famous Duke of Richmond heard many years ago that many persons in Ireland were starving, he said in the most perfect good faith: "Why don't they use curry powder? That's what I always take when I feel hungry and cannot get anything to eat." He was unconsciously using a strong protectionist argument. When people in this country at the present time want imported cornstarch, they have to pay as high as an ad valorem duty of 85½ per cent. But they can get curry powder free.

There are many other curiosities on the free list which show that the tariff, as it now is, falls most heavily on the poor and most lightly on the rich.

The statesman whose appetite has to be stimulated by the famous Strasbourg pie of geese livers, has only to pay an advance of 25 per cent. and the United States custom authorities let him have it. But if he were a poor man and wanted plain rice for his hunger he must needs pay 106 per cent. of an advance for it.

Two substances in this world have pronounced odors which once felt are never forgotten. Who can forget the sickeningly sweet smell of attar of roses? A single drop will stay on a handkerchief even after it has passed through the laundry. Even the inferior varieties of it sold in this country cost the colored dandy about ten cents a drop for the laudable purpose of increasing his attractiveness with dusky belles. Attar of roses is on the free list.

There is a smell, not a perfume, familiar to all those who were not born or grown up. It is a nauseating, disagreeable smell, with oceans of possibilities behind it. It comes to us consciously after the first Christmas or birthday party. If we thought we were sick before, we are sure of it as soon as that horrifying odor reaches our nostrils. It is castor oil!

Yet this is one of the most useful and valuable remedies ever used by physicians. When the duty on quinine was repealed, it was avowedly on the ground that the public gain would more than suffice for any private loss engendered thereby. But three or four manufactories in the United States make cold drawn castor oil, and the industry must be protected. One would say that half as much more again as the dreadful medicine costs in Europe would be enough protection. But no, it takes a duty of 180 per cent. on imported castor oil to keep these three or four factories alive. Would it not be cheaper to buy these manufactories outright and allow the children of the country to have a natural reaction after their parties, free from the aching care of coal?

An old fable tells what happened when the nail was lost from the horse's shoe. The story was not laid in America, otherwise there would have been more excuse for the rider. The duty on horseshoe nails is fixed at a modest 103 per cent. On the other hand, if a man wants gold studs he has only to pay an import duty of 25 per cent.

The great wisdom of the nation's congress has been pleased to place a duty of 15 per cent. on imported potatoes. This tariff acts in a very erratic manner. In the great majority of years our farmers grow enough potatoes for all uses, and sell them sufficiently cheap to defy foreign competition, handicapped as it is by the addition of freight charges. But once in a while the potato crop here is a failure. Then farmers and everyone else want them. They get them, of course, from Labrador, Germany and Scotland, but for every dollar's worth that enters the country a duty of fifteen cents is sternly exacted to swell the steady overflowing surplus in the treasury.

Pay Up.

Dear readers: Some of you owe for the paper for over a year, and we need the cash very much. With the editor sick and no money to hire extra help, business can't move very lively until some of you come to the front and help us.

Dr. N. J. Perry went to Detroit Wednesday.

Ed Aldrich is home with his parents for a few days.

The doctors report an unusual amount of sickness now.

I. H. Morehouse has located for the winter at Tacoma, Wash.

The Mancelona Herald issued an elegant double Christmas number.

☞ Lace curtains cleaned equal to new. Mrs. M. Mosyr.

S. H. Beardslee and wife went to Grand Rapids to spend the holidays.

W. H. Hurlbut of South Haven is in town looking after his real estate interests here.

Capt. Jas. Beauvais, of the U. S. tug Gen. Gillmore, is at Charlevoix for the holiday season.

Frank E. Brown arrived home from Chicago Wednesday, to spend the holidays with his parents.

☞ See the crayon portraits that Washburne & Co. advertise about their show windows. Don't miss it.

A number of the young friends of Miss Nettie Shrier gave her a pleasant surprise party Thursday evening.

John Burns and wife go to Detroit and Grand Rapids this week to visit friends. They expect to be absent about three weeks.

The Rifenburg Milling Co. remembered the printer on Christmas morning with a sack of Iron Duke, the best flour in the market.

The Young Peoples' Society of the Congregational church will give their next social on Tuesday evening, Jan. 7th, 1890, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Fox.

☞ Carriage and sleigh painting done. Shop over R. Miller's old black smith shop. Your patronage most respectfully solicited. Bert Jarvis, Charlevoix, Mich.

John Bell has a ledge of limestone on his farm that will make him a small fortune some day when properly worked. It lies just as good lime as the Petoskey article.

Married, on Monday evening, Dec. 23d, at the home of the pastor of the Congregational church by the Rev. Jno. S. Rood, Mr. Leslie Giddings and Miss Mary Lamphear, all of Charlevoix. We extend our congratulations and wish them long years of usefulness and happiness.

Christmas exercises were held at the Baptist and the Congregational churches, and for the M. E. church at Bartholomew's opera hall. At the Baptist church there was a tree and Santa Claus headquarters, with presents for all. At the Congregational church there were two trees and the usual exercises. At the opera hall the M. E. Sunday school had a literary program and supper for the children. The weather was unfavorable, yet the children all seemed to enjoy themselves.

No, gentlemen, the JOURNAL will not cover itself all over with mortgages rather than cut down its size or price, or receive its dues in trade. But for $1.60 we can furnish more and better reading matter than the best ready-print country paper in Northern Michigan. Our combination with the Detroit Weekly Free Press enables us to do this. In the Free Press you get all the important news of the world before other papers are a week old, while in the ready-print you cannot get them till they are ten days or two weeks old. Judge for yourself, dear reader, which is the cheapest.—8 pages of stale news for $1.50 or 16 pages of fresh news for $1.60?

The hard times that are pinching Charlevoix this winter are not due so much to any drawback of this particular community as to the business customs in vogue here during the past few years. Almost unlimited credit has been given to almost every man exhibiting an intention or willingness to pay sometime. Many of those that were trusted are now little or no better able to pay than when they got the goods. The merchant who has reached the bottom of his pile must not only restrict his credits but insist on the payment of arrears, to save himself. If the poor man has only the wants of the present to provide for, it would be bad enough; but when he has also his own extravagance of the past to balance, the situation becomes discouraging. This is undoubtedly the reason so many run away from their debts,—it is easier than paying them. All people may not agree with us, but we think that the merchants cannot do themselves or the community greater injury than by giving such unlimited credit. The quicker they get to a cash basis the better it will be for all.

The schoolmaster of the republic,—so Noah Webster has been called; and two or three generations have grown up under his training from Webster's Spelling Book, to Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, in business and professional life. This latter has been rebuilt and added to till it is like a great University, comprising not only a complete "regular course" of Lexicography but also full special departments," as, for example, a Biographical Dictionary of nearly 10,000 names, a New Gazetteer of the World with 25,000 titles embracing valuable information in condensed form under each title, and a variety of other useful helps to knowledge in its elaborate tables. Its latest addition, the Statesmen, must be of great use to the many who do not possess the more bulky and expensive Gazetteers. What more can we ask in a dictionary than we now have in Webster's Unabridged?

Anniversary of the Crusade.

How the Farmer Gets Left.

If over a tax was imposed out of "pure cussedness" it is the tariff on common salt. This substance is now one of the prime necessities of life. Man might possibly get along without bread or meat, but in some form or other he must have salt for his blood, for his tissues, for his brain, and all the secretions which help to carry through the processes of digestion.

Salt is not only a necessity to man, but one of the most important raw materials used in manufacturing industries. It is chiefly used in the United States by farmers, meat packers and fish curers. Farmers have a multitude of uses for salt. They place it in licking pans, to keep their cattle and sheep in good health. They sprinkle fodder with it. Butter will not keep without salt, so large quantities of it are used for this purpose. Everyone now knows that cheese does not taste of salt for nothing.

The immense meat packing industries of the west use very large quantities of salt in making compressed corned beef and the other modes of preserving fresh meat.

Fishermen down east also use salt in fish curing. Not a small quantity either, since in the year 1886 they paid $126,599 for it.

Large meat packers are very rich, and powerful in a political sense. Nearly all their preserved goods are exported. In actual figures $8,839,077 worth of canned beef products, and $2,617,639 worth of salted and pickled beef were exported from the United States in the year 1888.

But fish canners and meat packers have apparently a much greater pull with the powers that be than farmers have. Because, whereas the government, in the year ending June, 1887, collected $1,488,031 duty on imported salt, neither the meat packers nor the fish canners paid any portion of this tax, or else had a rebate of the amount which they paid then their exports began.

Of the entire quantity of salt imported into this country, at least two-thirds are for the farmers' uses. No matter what price fine foreign salt is, the dairy farmer who makes butter must apparently buy it or suffer his butter to be classed among inferior qualities.

Yet the farmer gets no rebate on account of the salt in the dairy products which he exports out of this country. The fish curer gets his salt free; the meat packer gets a rebate of the entire duty and the farmer gets left.

Eveline.

Dec. 24.—Prof. W. A. Stanley was in Boyne City on business Monday.

Miss Jennie Jarman returned home from Marion Sunday where she has been stopping with Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Clark for the past two months.

Henry Jubbinville and Jim Addis of Boyne City were in town Sunday.

A party at Peter Tuttle's last Saturday evening. Everybody enjoyed themselves.

Earnest Warner who has been on a visit to his uncle, D. N. Gregory, for some two months past, left for Lapeer county on Sunday where he will visit relatives and schoolmates for a month, after which he will return to Topeka, Kansas.

Joe Tuttle and wife returned home from Boyne last week to stay. Joe has given up his job as stage driver for A. J. Hall.

Another sprinkle of snow, but it is slowly disappearing after the shower of rain Monday night and Tuesday. Don't look for snow sufficient for log hauling before the New Year.

W. E. Bedwin of Boyne City was in town Saturday on a visit to his mother. He was enroute for Petoskey wood to spend Christmas with his father-in law, Rev. B. H. Whitman.

Born, to Mr. and Mrs. J. Tuttle a son, Dec 21. Joe can now be seen with a smile on his face when you meet him.

Notices are posted that if taxes are paid into the treasurer's office before January 1st the fees will only be three per cent. instead of four. Remember this ye tax payer, and save your pennies.

Joe Gyles has purchased ten acres of timber from S. B. Brown and is now engaged lumbering it off.

Wilson.

Merry Christmas.

We are anxiously looking for snow, but it rains instead.

Wells Smith is able to be around again.

Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Smith of Advance called at F. L. Smith's on Monday last.

The school children of Afton are having a little festival, dinner, etc. today (Tuesday). There will be a vacation the rest of the week.

Miss Lillie Smith had an attack of bleeding at the lungs on Monday, but she is better at present.

We are sorry to report the death of infant son of Joseph and Josephine Warden. It was buried on Wednesday last.

A tramp showman with flaming posters took in the citizens of Afton to the amount of over $2.00 on Wednesday evening last. It was a very poor magic lantern exhibit.

J. R. Nice's youngest child Beulah is ill with inflamation of the lungs. Dr. Willard is in attendance.

Mrs. D. Rugh of Greenville, niece of Jabez Bacon and cousin of Geo. Bowen and Mrs. F. L. Smith, arrived at Mr. Smith's on Saturday last accompanied by her little daughter, where Mr. R. has been spending nearly two months. They expect to remain during the winter.

Inwood.

No use to go to Florida for nice weather,—the weather here is nice enough for any one.

W. J. McGeagh is clearing a tract of timber which will make consider able improvement to his farm.

Several more cases of sore throat in town. The doctors insist that it is not diphtheria but it occasionally kills just the same.

O. D. Hilton has not lost any bear trees by blight until this year, when five trees about ten years old, which have borne full every year, were stricken with the disease.

Mrs. John Cleveland and son of Ironton are visiting friends near Inwood.

Mrs. James Cook is improving slowly.

Willard Olney's folks are sick with the sore throat.

Chester Denton is clearing the timber from 25 acres this winter, and expects to get it in to crops next summer.

A. Chase is breaking a team of colts.

Nash has discharged some of his teams till snow comes.

The Durand grange has received its winter supply of groceries.

Norwood farmers are still plowing.

Joe Shores has gone to East Jordan to work with his team.

The McGeagh district, continue their Sunday school, which seems to prosper under the management of Mrs. Porter.

William Heise's broken arm is improving nicely.

Advance.

Dec. 24.—It looks with the rain pouring down as if Santa Claus would have to travel with a rubber suit on or else stay at home.

Delos Phillips has been quite sick, but is now getting better.

Our school closes today and the winter term will commence the 6th of January. Miss Addie Lewis the present teacher has been engaged to teach the next term.

Mrs. William Zimmerman has returned home from East Jordan where she has been stopping for some time.

Twins at Louis Heller's causeth the whole family to rejoice with exceeding great joy.

Mr. George Wood recently passed through our village on his way to Boyne City.

Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich of Ironton were the guests at A. B. Steele's one day last week.

The Advance correspondent to the Boyne Citizen has lost her pencil.

Dick Walters has returned to Advance from Ellsworth. He became frightened at the many cases of diphtheria which seem to prevail there. There have never been a case of diphtheria in Advance.

Horton's Bay.

Mrs. V. Hervin and daughter Lois will spend Christmas at Petoskey with Mrs. H's brother, Will Corwin.

Brazile Corwin who is working for Porter Smith spent Sunday at home.

Geo. Griffin of Evangeline was in town last week.

Mrs. Dilworth was in Petoskey last week.

THE ENGLISH WEAVER GETS AS MUCH MONEY AS THE AMERICAN.

What Printed Calicoes Are Made From. Fall River and Providence Make 833,000 Pieces of Print Cloths Every Week. The Massachusetts Weaver's Capacity.

Printed calico is a very well known fabric. Women and girls take home dresses and morning wrappers. In its indigo blue variety it provides thousands of waists for small boys. In coarser varieties, bed comforters have one or both sides made of it. In still another variety it is the material out of which printed shirts are made for men. In fact, its uses are endless, and its consumption in consequently very large.

Before a piece of printed calico reaches maturity, as we see it, the raw cotton has to undergo different processes of manufacture. First, it must be spun into yarn. Then this yarn is woven into a loose, soft, fluffy cloth. At this stage the fabric is called a print cloth.

So far all the cotton travels together. Before it becomes any variety of printed cotton goods it must pass through the print cloth stage. What raw cotton is to the print cloth the print cloth is to the finished fabric. It is a kind of raw material for making printed cotton out of. Also, like most raw materials, the terms of payment for it are very prompt. Net cash within ten days are the almost invariable ones.

Like many raw materials, too, print cloths are the subject of a good deal of speculation in "spots" and "futures." It is not so many years ago since one very large manufacturing firm became bankrupt in attempting to corner the print cloth market by buying up futures. Another firm saw the game and held nearly a million pieces of print cloths in reserve, which they successfully unloaded before the cornering firm suspected there was any such quantity of goods concealed in the market.

The headquarters of the print cloth market is at Fall River, Mass. Under ordinary circumstances the print cloth mills in Fall River turn out 190,000 pieces of print clothsevery week. Providence is also a print cloth center, though a smaller one. Its mills make 43,000 pieces of print cloths every week.

These 233,000 pieces are made for the open market, and are either sold to some printer as soon as they are made, or very often in the busy season are contracted for by the printers before the cloths have been actually manufactured.

Of course there must be some standard in print cloths, otherwise the buyer and seller would be involved in endless disputes. So it is agreed by the trade that an ordinary piece of print cloth should be twenty-eight inches wide as it leaves the loom; that seven yards of the width of cloth should weigh one pound avoirdupois; that the yarn out of which it is woven should be within two numbers on either side of what is called No. 30 yarn, and, lastly, that one square inch of the cloth should have sixty-four threads each way. It is the latter requirement that gives the ordinary print cloth the common term of 64-64's—that is, sixty-four threads warp crossed by sixty-four threads filling in each square inch.

The curious thing about this system of measurement is that the same rules are followed in England by the Lancashire cotton weavers. Last year, Mr. J. Schoenhof, United States consul at Tunstall, England, took over with him some specimens of American print cloths made at Lowell, Mass., in order to compare them in the matter of cost with those made in Lancashire. After a long and very patient investigation, Mr. Schoenhof set these results home to the state department, by which they were duly printed in the consular reports.

The first startling conclusion arrived at by the consul was that it cost more in wages to make a yard of print cloth in Lancashire than in Massachusetts. To make a pound of raw cotton into print cloth in America and England respectively, cost 8.551 cents and 9.255 cents. These figures are made up as follows:

	America.	England.
Total cost of spinning	1.592	1.708
Total cost of weaving	5.736	4.864
Total cost of supplies, etc.	2.223	2.683
	8.551	9.255

Looked at in another way, the average daily rate of men, male spinners, in Lancashire is from $1.53 to $1.68; the average rate in Massachusetts is $1.50. For weaving, the piece rate per cut in Lancashire is 25 cents for 50 yards; in Massachusetts it is only 20 cents for the same length and size, or 33 per cent. more is paid in England than in America.

How, then, is it that we do not export print cloths to England? For two reasons: One is that English print cloths are finished and doctored to look better than they are; the other is that the high protective tariff enables print cloth manufacturers to reap enormous profits at home.

At this time of writing a yard of extra 64-64 print cloth sells at Fall River for 3¾ cents. The total cost, including a small profit to the manufacturer, is only 3 1-16 cents. So that there is 9-16ths of a cent, or more than half a cent, of profit on each yard of print cloth sold at these figures.

In this way it is no wonder that nearly all the Fall River print cloth mills have divided profits averaging over 10 per cent. during the last year; and, at the same time, it should be remembered that their workmen struck immensely fully for a rise in wages last spring. When the workmen began to starve they went back to the old monopoly shop again.

After these figures and facts, who shall say that protection and big profits mean better wages for workmen?

Since 1860 the mortgages on the farm lands of the state of Illinois have increased from $105,525,237 to $193,723,098. This is an increase of 23 per cent., which is more than double the increase in the farming lands themselves. The Illinois farmers seem to be getting fat under high tariff.

TARIFF REFORM IN THE ELECTIONS.

Planks of Democratic Platforms in States Where Republicans Lost.

NEW YORK.

The Democratic party of the state of New York, in convention assembled, reaves the pledges of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the doctrines of the national platform of 1888, adopted at St. Louis. We have not advocated and do not advocate free trade, but we steadfastly advocate the principles of tariff reform, believing that adherence to the right alone carries in itself the certainty of triumph. We heartily indorse the honest and fearless administration of the national government by Grover Cleveland.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Meeting for the first time since the defeat of last year, we declare our continued and hearty support of the cause of tariff reform for which we then contended, and our firm conviction of its success in the near future.

We reaffirm our demands for free raw materials and lower duties upon the necessities of life. We believe that free wool, as provided for in the bill passed by the Democratic majority of the last house of representatives, is essential to the prosperity of the woolen industry, upon which that of the wool grower is dependent, while it will afford relief to all consumers of woolen goods. We call the particular attention of the farmers of this state, who have borne the heavy burden of high tariff taxation without any of the prosperity promised them, to the relief they will receive through the reduction of customs taxes upon articles which they use or consume.

OHIO.

The Democracy of Ohio, in convention assembled, approve the declaration of principles made by the national Democracy in St. Louis in 1888, and especially that part of it demanding reduction of tariff taxes, and we will continue the battle for tariff reform until the cause of the people is triumphant.

We regard trusts, in whatever form organized, as the legitimate result of our present tariff system; and we demand the repeal of all tariff taxes that enable them to extort from the people the exorbitant prices for the products they control.

IOWA.

We renew our opposition to the unconstitutional and unjust policy of high tariff taxation, which robs the many to enrich the few; makes the producer the slave of the manufacturer; lays its heavy burdens on the farmer, the mechanic and the day laborer, whom it daily robs; gives no return through any channel and fosters trusts, which are the legitimate result of our present tariff system, and we denounce the fallacy of the Republican state platform of Iowa, that a high tariff is or can be any protection to the farmer.

Why Tax Straw Hats?

A fashionable lady bathing in the sea at Long Branch or Newport has her fashionable bathing suit capped by a peculiar looking straw hat. The wide eaves of this hat are tied underneath her chin, causing its fore and aft aspects to appear like two old scuttle bonnets placed back to back. From Maine to Florida fishermen affect a coarse straw hat with a wide, turned up brim, and seem to take great comfort therein. Out on the great western farms men of all ages, in hot weather, seem addicted to wearing straw hats with wide brims turned down. The fashionable lady, the fisherman and the farmer are all wearing precisely the same kind of hat.

Where do these hats come from? They are so marvelously cheap that they almost seem like Topsy, "no hat growed." The great majority of them cost the retailer only thirty-five cents a dozen. It seems impossible that any man or manufacturer could do so much plaiting for so little money.

These straw hats are manufactured almost to the first instance. They come from different countries, and have been accordingly divided by the trade into four classes. Italy gives us "Leghorns;" Spain sends us "Malagas;" South America exports to us "Curacoas," and from China we get "grass hats."

With the exception, perhaps, of the China variety, these hats are all what is known as "by products." Even the easily contented peasants of sunny Italy could hardly afford to make it the business of their lives to furnish this country with straw hats at a remuneration of, at most, fifteen cents a dozen. But children need not be very strong or very big to wander about their homes during the summer time and collect the wild straw in small bundles. Then when the long nights arrive, all the members of the family sit and plait the straw into braids and then stitch the braids into shapeless hats.

These hats are quickly bought up by exporters. They are then packed in bales, which are subjected to hydraulic pressure in order to get the finish their bulk. When they become nothing more nor less than flat disks of straw by this treatment they are shipped to the United States.

There is nothing like these straw hats made in this country; no grass or straw so suitable, no labor so little worth. Yet the keen eye of Uncle Sam makes them out as a special object from which the inhabitants of his territory should be sternly protected by an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. In this way the bloated surplus was increased in the year 1887 by $189,344.

Once in this country, after the grasping surplus has had its pound of flesh, the tariff can well enough. There are several large factories in Massachusetts which shape, iron and bleach or dye them, sometimes even ornament them with ribbons. Then they are sold to the jobber, after profit has been calculated on net cost, plus 20 per cent. duty. The jobber calculates his profit on the same basis, plus 20 per cent. grows, like a rolling snowball, until it finally causes the consumer to pay about double what he might if the senseless tariff on those cheap straw hats was abolished.

Is Consumption Incurable.

Read the following: Mr. C. H. Morris, Newark, Ark., says: "Was down with a cough, lost all strength and physicians pronounced me consumptive. Was induced by a friend to try using Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, and now on my third bottle, and able to resume the work on my farm. It is the finest medicine ever made."

Jessie Middlewart, Decatur, Ohio, says: "Had it not been for Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption I would have died of Lung Troubles. Was given up by the doctors. My mother is next to inhale it." Trial bottles free at F. G. Hines & Co.'s drug store.

PRINTERS' INK.

A JOURNAL FOR ADVERTISERS.

PRINTERS' INK is just what it purports to be, "a journal for advertisers." It is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—its tools journal, as it speaks—of American advertisers. It tells the leading and progressive advertisers in plain, comprehensive articles how, when, and where to advertise; what newspapers or other media to use; how much to expend—in fact, discourses on every point that admits of profitable discussion. If you advertise at all, PRINTERS' INK can help you. Publishing you signal but The Journal's fame is advertising; if so, PRINTERS' INK may show you how to obtain the service you are now getting for one-half the money. A Print's subscription price is one dollar; a sample copy costs but Five Cents. Advertising is an art practiced by many but understood by few. The conductors of PRINTERS' INK understand it thoroughly. Surely their advice, based on an experience of more than twenty-five years, will help you. Address—

THAT REPUBLICAN RING.

It is but natural and proper that the Sentinel should rush to the defense of everything with a tinge of republican partyism in it. But his attempt this week to defend the republican machinery of the village council from the charge of an appearance of ring manipulation is on a level with his numerous other crazy utterances,—they injure the men he assumes to defend more than the item does which he seeks to refute.

The Sentinel does not deny the existence of a republican ring in Charlevoix. It reiterates and emphasizes the charge (unintentionally, perhaps), and gives names. After naming the township board he says, "all republicans, therefore corrupt." And naming the president and council, says "mostly republicans, hence they are robbers. These are the men who are grinding the tax-payers." Whether the gentlemen named by the Sentinel are personally responsible, or whether any of them have been influenced by others, we shall not say, but it is a fact there have been mutterings and complaints for months, and there have been stormy meetings when the democratic minority were persistently sat down on for their opposition to certain measures.

We have discussed the matter this week with three republican members of the council, and while all deny and dispute the existence of a ring or anything of that nature, two admit that there were some actions that on the surface would have the appearance of a ring to an outsider. They all admit that some expenses were higher than they should have been, but try to explain by asserting that they were unable to cut them down without sacrificing other interests.

We have reason to believe that certain influences outside of the council have been at work, but each member of the council indignantly denies that the parties mentioned have any influence whatever with them.

The increase of village expenses may not be large in any one place, but it shows itself in some department, where there has not been a corresponding increase in value of service rendered. The affairs of the county we insist have been manipulated, in some respects, at least, by a very few men for their own personal gain, and at a greatly increased expense to the tax-payers of the county.

THE "ABSTRACT STEAL."

The "big four," (which, by the way, was one-quarter democratic) has been repudiated in Charlevoix county, in the political execution, by republican votes, of its ruling spirit. No doubt the Journal draws its inspiration from what it has been pleased to call the "abstract steal." Let us remind the editor that the scheme had no more enthusiastic promoters than the democratic register of deeds and democratic county clerk.—Sentinel.

That "democratic one-quarter" has not been recognized as democratic by the JOURNAL since its alliance with the firm. Our honest convictions concerning him better not be stated. As to the "abstract steal," we let it alone because we were advised on all sides that it was a good thing for the people of the county. We are not yet fully satisfied on the question. But if it was a good thing, it might just as well have been done legally. Whether a democratic register and clerk, or any one else, were the promoters, a republican board of supervisors voted to buy the abstracts, notwithstanding the amount to be paid was in excess of what they could lawfully appropriate. (See par. 7 of sec. 483 of Howell's Statutes.) And we are satisfied that the "big four," as part of the republican ring in this county, helped to bring it about.

Detroit Free Press Souvenir.

One of the handsomest souvenirs we have seen for many days has just been received from the Detroit Free Press. Sixteen large pages besides illuminated cover are filled with choice miscellany and fine engravings, appealing to the highest and noblest sentiments of young and old. Accompanying the souvenir is a picture 14x20, suitable for framing, full of every-day life and reality, a scene to be found in many homes, a small boy touching his pet dog the a, b, c's.

The household department of the Weekly Free Press has been enlarged and improved, and has been placed in editorial charge of Mrs. Eva Best, a favorite writer, whose name is known everywhere among women. Incorporated with the Household is a new department, merry times for girls and boys, which is delightfully conducted by Mrs. Margaret Eytinge. The Household will hereafter be published in separate form—a complete paper in itself—and will be mailed as a supplement to the Weekly Free Press. It will be nicely illustrated.

The publication of the prize stories, which have created so far reaching and favorable an impression, will be continued during the coming year. Those stories are of the highest literary merit, and of absorbing interest.

All of the regular news and literary will be maintained at their present high standard.

The price of the Weekly Free Press is $1.00 a year, and the souvenir and picture are given with every yearly subscriber.

We continue to club this excellent paper with the JOURNAL for $1.60 for both, when paid cash in advance.

If He Could Only Fill It.

Little Mary is a good little girl nearly 5 years old, but possessed of a poetical genius which runs rather too strongly toward paraphrasing. She has done a good deal of composing during her brief existence, but mainly in the way of words substituted for others, which left her open to the charge of plagiarism. She is also possessed of a fund of humor which would not be expected in one so young. Mary's father the other day, by way of breaking the child of her fault as a poet and testing her capacity at original composition, offered her as a Christmas present the largest and best picture book that could be found in Chicago if she would make up a piece of poetry which would not resemble any other that she had ever heard. She was given two days to complete the task, and yesterday morning sang the following as her original composition:

Hey diddle diddle,
The cat and the fiddle,
He cuts you doo's forget;
If Santa Claus can fill it,
We'll all be wealthy yet.

It is needless to say that Mary lost the prize, her father pronouncing the poem a parody, and one which showed reckless disregard for the truth on the part of the child.—Chicago Herald.

Millais a Gold Digger.

Few people know that Sir John Millais, the great English artist, was for a short time a gold digger in the Australian colonies. Young John Millais, some thirty-five years ago, caught the gold fever, and, abandoning pro tem. his career as an artist, sailed for Melbourne. The present prime minister was one of his companions de voyage. But John Millais, although he roughed it bravely and turned the soil over with all the frenzied industry of the gold seeker, had in the end to confess to disappointment. He put in three months at the digging, and then returned a sadder and wiser man to England.—Montreal Star.

A False Pretense.

"Well, my son," asked Jimmy Tuffboy's mother, "are you satisfied with your Christmas?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied Jimmy, "only the skates ain't nickel plated, and dad said he'd buy me a double ripper, so I didn't see it."

"But I am sure you have been happy all day, James."

"I wasn't going to let the fellers know how bad I felt."—Exchange.

Too Near the First of the Month.

"One thing I've got against Christmas."

"What's that?"

"It comes too late in the month."

"How does that affect it?"

"Why, when a man's wife gives him a splendid present the bill is sent to him in about a week. It would be better if he had about three weeks to get ready for it."—Christmas.

An Old English Custom.

Among customs now disused, a ceremony existed at the court of England as late as the reign of Charles II of bringing a branch of the Glastonbury thorn, which usually blossoms on Christmas eve, in procession, and presenting it, with great pomp, to the king and queen on Christmas morning.—New York Post.

Received Some Himself.

"Have a cigar, Charley?"

"Don't care if I do."

"Some that my wife gave me for a Christmas present."

"Er, come to think of it, Tom, I guess I don't feel like smoking today."—Exchange.

Not Entirely Without Remembrance.

First Soldier—Get any Christmas?
Second Soldier—Yep; present.
First Soldier—Not
Second Soldier—You bet.
First Soldier—What?
Second Soldier—Present arms.—Exchange.

What the Shop Keepers Dread.

"It is time for Santa Claus," said the young wife.

"Yes," said the spouse, who kept a retail store, "Santa Claus is welcome, but I do not want to see the rain dear."—Exchange.

THE STORY OF A MARE.

She Slept in the Kitchen and Knew When It Was Necessary to Flee Up.

A well known man who lives not far from Newcastle, Me., told me of an experience he had a few winters since with a horse of which he was very fond. He was driving across Jefferson pond one afternoon when the mare went through the ice. In an instant the sleigh also went under. The gentleman managed to get out of the water himself after a valiant struggle, when, finding himself upon a firm footing, he turned his attention to the horse. After a long time, the assistance of two men was secured, and, even then, nearly an hour elapsed before the poor horse was rescued, thoroughly chilled and exhausted.

Not far off, her owner had a friend who lived in the old fashioned house in which I listened to the story, a house with a cellar kitchen.

He led the mare straight into this kitchen where she laid down, gladly enough, before a big, blazing open fire.

Warm blankets were thrown over the poor creature, and hot drinks were given her. Then her owner, pretty well chilled and tired out himself, passed to a bedroom on the same floor and soon fell asleep. About midnight he was awakened by something passing over the bed clothes. He felt a little startled. Then he felt a warm breath upon his face, and lo! the mare had come into the room to find her master and thank him, for she fell to licking his face gently!

Her owner was manly enough to own up that he was so touched, that he cried over her. Finally he rose, led her back to the kitchen, threw a big log upon the wood fire, lay down by the hearthstone, while her master, silently registering a vow that the grateful creature should never pass out of his hands, returned to his own bed. I used the expression "he was manly enough," for I quote the belief of Bayard Taylor: "The bravest are tenderest. —Kate Van Twinkle in Lewiston Journal.

An Unfortunate Postcard.

The Siam papers contain an account of the imprisonment in Bangkok of a Turkish subject, named Belitski, for seven months without being brought to trial by the Siamese authorities. His offense was that, having lately arrived in Bangkok from Hong Kong, he had addressed to his wife, Mme. Charlotte Belitski, Tornovie Seimen, Eastern Roumelia, Turkey, a postcard, on which the following was written in the German language: "Bangkok, Dec. 1, 1888.—Here everything is wild and uncivilized; the women go about half naked. All vices flourish here; a paradise for problematic existences. What a contrast to the highly civilized natives of China and Japan, where I have lately been! Siam is a genuine Wallachian country. It is the wildest country I have ever seen in my travels.—Robert Belitski." On Dec. 16 Belitski was arrested on a charge, as he understood it, of libeling the Siamese government. He was never brought to trial, and was liberated on the representations of certain British subjects. He made his way to Batavia to lay his complaint before the Turkish consul there, Turkey having no treaty with Siam.—London Standard.

Warmth and Coldness of Clothing.

Clothing possesses no warmth in itself, but, as it is more or less a poor conductor of heat, it prevents the escape of the bodily warmth. Woolen fabrics contain a large quantity of air entangled in their meshes which, being a poor conductor of heat, adds considerably to the warmth of clothing made from them. In hot weather we wear light cotton or linen clothing so as to allow as much of the bodily heat to escape as possible. There is a prejudice in favor of light colored clothing for summer wear, but it is hardly based on scientific grounds. Dark colored cloth is the best radiator, allowing the bodily heat to escape freely, while white clothing absorbs less of the heat radiated directly from the sun. Therefore, to dress scientifically in summer one should wear dark clothing in the shade and light clothing when exposed to the sun's rays. Practically, the matter of appearance is the only one to be considered, as the warmth or coolness of clothing is not apparently affected by its color.—Exchange.

Concrete.

The uses to which concrete made of Portland cement, sand and broken stone is being put are constantly increasing. It is cheaper than dressed stone of the better qualities and more enduring. Bridge piers have been constructed entirely of concrete, and down south they are building houses of it. It is almost time proof. A cake of Portland cement allowed to "set" under water for seven days will pull 450 pounds of tensile strength to the square inch. A brick and concrete conduit is the best thing known to engineering science for a waterway. Concrete pavements are the best known; concrete is as nearly fire proof as any material used by practical builders. In fact, the discovery of this chemical combination is one of the most valuable that has been made in the past ten years.—Interviewer in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

One Way to Cook a Rabbit.

A couple of Augusta disciples of Ninrod, while on a recent gunning trip, after a hard day's tramp succeeded in bagging a small rabbit. They knew that the animal was good eating, but as to how to cook him properly they were not as well posted. They pondered long on the subject until the pangs of hunger demanded immediate action of some sort, when they tied bunny up by the hind legs and picked him as the good housewife does a hen. They said he was good eating just the same, with the exception of an occasional tuft of fur which had escaped the picking process.—Kennebec Journal.

A Child's Answer.

His father stroked him on the head
And asked him who St. Nick could be
"I don't know Santa Claus," he said,
"But Santa Claus knows me."

JANUARY MAGAZINES.

Scribner's.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE for January begins the fourth year and seventh volume with the promise that during the current year it will follow its well-approved course of printing articles of interest in themselves, by writers who really have something to say; and of aiming that great variety shall be secured rather than that any single undertakings shall monopolize its space.

Godey's.

"Godey's Lady's Book" (the ladies' favorite) comes to us for January looking as fresh and bright as the New Year itself. Good stories fill its pages to repletion. A handsome steel plate for a frontispiece cannot fail to please both old and young. If only one half of the promises made are carried out, and when we know from experience that all the publishers promise will be done, this certainly will be the most popular magazine published for $3.00. Godey Pub. Co., Philadelphia, Pa. Price $2.

☞ Fine Binghampton Buckwheat Flour at O. W. Smith's for 3c per pound.

School reports for Ironton and Advance are unavoidably crowded over to next week.

Alden Chamberlin got his team to the fire engine first for the fire at Swallow's house.

L. D. Bartholomew has been quite sick the past week, and is still confined to his room.

W. B. Taylor has been sick for two weeks, but is now improving and will soon be out again.

We are glad to hear that the Sentinel "don't have to" cover itself with any more mortgages.

☞ An umbrella was left at Cochran's drug store recently. The owner can have the same by proving property and paying for this notice.

☞ Lost—a silk umbrella with a gold handle, January 1st, at the party at Mr. Fox's. The person having it will please return to Alick Rosenthal's store.

☞ Aldrich Sisters will sell fall and winter hats at cost for the next 30 days, to reduce stock. Now is the time to get a bargain in the best goods. Call and see.

"The 'big four' has been repudiated in Charlevoix county."—Sentinel. And they are still on top; from present appearances they are likely to stay there a while.

The fine printing of the Chicago Weekly Herald makes its illustrations—unexcelled by those of any other newspaper — very attractive. The Herald is only One Dollar per year.

Get ready for the sociable of young folps' social at the home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Fox, Jan. 7th, 8 to 10 P. M. Explosive mottoes and apples for refreshments. Good music. Literary entertainment, etc., etc. All for 10 cents.

Baker & Son have an elegant new family sleigh to carry the O. E. Wood and family as soon as there is sufficient snow. It is low, broad and commodious, and the frame is light and strong. The seats are well upholstered and have high, comfortable backs.

The 18th birthday of Miss Florence M. Smith and Mr. Bert A. Fox was celebrated on the evening of January 1st, by a joint reception at the residence of Amos Fox. The entertainment included games, music, and recitations, followed by refreshments. All present report an enjoyable evening.

"What a joke it would be if Anderson should retain Hon. Will A Noyes to defend him in the perjury case. Two to one he could acquit."—Sentinel. Not much of a joke, either. It would simply be in line with other recent transactions, in which the "big four" show their strength.

Our club offer with the Weekly Free Press for $1.60 is cheaper than any stale ready print, unless a man gets trusted for the ready print, and never intends to pay. If you want only the local news, take the Journal at $1.00. If you want more, get the best and most for your money, by taking the Weekly Free Press also at 1.60.

On Tuesday night Charlevoix had a narrow escape from another big loss. Chas. See, janitor at the city hall, had been in the library all the evening. After closing he went to the residence of his father, and remained a few minutes. On returning to the hall he saw a light in the register in the jail, and on examination found the woodwork around the register ablaze. Having water handy, the fire was soon extinguished, but it would have had burned and charred several feet space of the floor. Had he been absent a few minutes longer, the building would undoubtedly have been destroyed. It is supposed that the fire was caused by forcing the heat from the north furnace, past the jail register which was closed, and through a long pipe to the library. The south double furnace had not been properly cleaned during the summer, and was so clogged that it smoked, which is given as the reason for forcing the heat from the north furnace to the library.

For the last six years the Sentinel has characterized the editor of the JOURNAL as a "jack-in-the-box" useful only for the amusement of some political manipulator, utterly devoid of any mental self control, the weak tool or cats paw of somebody; but the Sentinel never intimates who this manipulator is. Now we demand the particulars. Who is the real manager of the Journal? Who dictates its policy and looks after its finances? Who determines what to denounce or what to let alone? Answer these questions, Mr. Sentinel, before you talk any more about a "jack-in-the-box" bobbing up when someone "pulls the string."

Late Locals.

The Journal being a day late again this week, we are able to report that a fire started in C. E. Swallow's house about 10 o'clock this (Friday) morning. Mrs. Swallow happened to be in the yard and saw smoke issuing from a chamber window, and gave the alarm. The fire started where the pipe passed through a wall, and exploded to the floor above, spreading out between the joist. A prompt response of neighbors and a ready supply of water extinguished the fire. Damage estimated at $100, fully insured.

It was reported Friday noon that Roswell Mudge fallen from a load of wood and broken an arm, but we have not learned particulars.

☞ I. O. O. F. Installation and Banquet. The following officers for Round Lake Lodge No. 293 I.O. O. F. were installed last Wednesday evening, Jan. 1st. for the ensuing term:

N. G.—Alick Rosenthal.
V. G.—Geo. W. Cook.
R. Sec.—Chas. J. Strang.
F. Sec.—John Burns.
Treas.—L. D. Bartholomew.
R. S. N. G.—Jesse Washburn.
L. S. N. G.—J. M. Thompson.
W.—Joseph Benoras.
C.—James E. Wood.
R. S. S.—E. Weaver.
L. S. S.—Joseph Swalls.
I. G.—Isaac Mills.
O. G.—A. Cameron.
R. S. V. G.—Chas. E. Swallow.
L. S. V. G.—Leslie Giddings.

After installation ceremonies were concluded the wives of the members proceeded in a body, armed with all the etceteras of a first-class supper, and surprised their husbands by demanding admittance to the hall. After the astonished brothers learned the mission of the visitors, the doors were opened wide and all went harmonious and happy until midnight.

Capital Increased.

The Charlevoix Savings Bank has been reorganized under the new state banking law, and on Jan. 1st increased its capital to $40,000, all paid up. The officers remain the same. A list of the stock holders and directors will be published next week.

All banks organized under the new state banking law are subject to the same restrictions as national banks, being under the immediate supervision of the state bank commissioner, appointed by the governor. Depositors are secured to an amount double the capital stock of the bank. The business and profits of the bank will undoubtedly increase to the full proportion of the new capital.

Congregational Church.

At the Congregational church next Sunday morning, sermon followed by reception of members and communion service. Sermon in the evening, Young Peoples praise and devotional meeting at 6 p.m. The week of prayer will be observed.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

(The JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the townships in this county. We want a correspondent in every village and we want the news in as brief and concise manner as possible. Letters should reach us by mail or be mailed so as to reach us no later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality.)

Boyne City.

JAN. 1.—Rain, and no sleighing which makes every one feel poor; But in spite of the hard times the little god Cupid has been getting in his work lively during the holiday season, many of our young people responding by willingly accepting Hymen's fetters.

On Dec. 26th Mr. B. Lyke of Boyne City and Miss Lena House of Deer Lake. By the Rev. J. Burdge, at the residence of the bride's father.

Also at Jordan, Dec. 22d, Mr. G. M. Lalond of East Jordan and Miss Ollie Lewis of Boyne City.

In the M. E. Church, Dec. 25, by the Rev. J. Burdge, Mr. James Picket and Miss Minnie Campbell, both of Wilson.

J. M. Harris started for Lansing Christmas morning to attend the State Teachers' Convention held at that place. Mrs. H. spending the holidays with her parents in Ironton.

While rolling logs in the Haywood camp Fred Deitz had the misfortune to break one of his legs.

The Christmas trees were a success in both churches; the presents being plenty and some very nice and all seemed to have a good time.

J. S. Thatcher of Grand Rapids is visiting the family of S. B. Thatcher of this place.

A good deal of excitement prevails at Bay Springs over a family disturbance resulting in the husband injuring his wife through beating her until a physician had to be called, who reports a serious case. Such cases should not escape the notice of the civil authorities.

O, Sam!! Sam!! I never imagined for a moment that the three of the "big four" who followed me as witness in the Anderson examination would be particular to corroborate my testimony.

Ironton.

Christmas passed off very quietly in this vicinity, not even a wedding to liven things up. The only thing worth mentioning being the loss at the Congregational church on Christmas day which was a very pleasant affair.

Mrs. Mitchell, wife of James Mitchell sen., died Saturday after a long illness with consumption. She leaves a husband and a large family to mourn. The funeral was held at the Congregational church Sunday afternoon.

Miss Ella Kimball is in Charlevoix this week visiting friends.

Mr. Parker sold a fine hog to W. S. Stripp last week.

Mr. Thorp purchased a fine five-year-old colt of Dan Caten of East Jordan one day last week, and as Will Thorp was trying to draw a load of wood Monday morning with him and another Lorse the dashboard came out of the wagon and hitting the colt on the heels they ran away throwing Will off the load and bruised him pretty badly. They were finaly stopped near Mr. Thorp's home with a pretty badly wrecked wagon.

Miss Lenzena Box who has been away for the past year is home on a two weeks visit. Her many friends are glad to see her again.

Charley Howard came home from Frankfort Sunday evening where he has been for six weeks ago to work in the camp. He reports the camps breaking up on account of no snow.

Advance.

Dec. 30.—Although it rained all day the day before Christmas yet the evening was beautiful and Santa Claus could have had no excuse for neglecting the little folks, and we hope that he made them all happy.

Some of our young people went to East Jordan Christmas eve and others went to Boyne City.

John Lloyd has been on the warpath and has begun the fight with the noble red man which resulted in a tie. He hopes that by next spring he will be respectfully decorated with feathers and will have several scalps hanging to his belt.

Peter Karleskin met with a severe accident while felling a tree last Friday. The tree striking him on the side of the right knee giving it a bad wrench which may lay him up for some time.

Several of our citizens attended the Masonic social at Boyne City last Friday night.

Van Newville of Pleasant Valley, looking as pleasant as ever, was in town last Saturday.

Quite a number of our citizens seem to have secured jobs of holding down counters at Steele's.

Wilson.

Nice Weather.

Happy New Year to all.

Christmas was the pleasantest day of the year.

Bah Vance is convalescent.

Mob Hedley, Joe Moore and families go to Clam Lake to spend New Years.

H. E. Scofield of South Arm called on relatives here on Sunday.

Joseph Cooper, R. Sherman and families moved into the house by the mill on Thursday. Joe runs the mill while Mr. S. will engineer.

Saints held services Christmas day at the Sedgeman school house. In the evening an ordinance meeting was held at Meb Healey's, where feet-washing and communion was performed.

Thomas Shepherd, sr., had several bad spells Monday and Tuesday.

Inwood.

Nash will begin to stock his Banks mill with logs next week on wheels.

McGeagh is grinding feed at his mill.

Miss Della Patten of Boyne spent Sunday with the family of O. D. Hilton.

Amasa Sanburn is building a house on his own land east of Alfred Vandensen's, and will soon move on.

O. D. Wood had two horses gored by a bull last week.

Wm. Evans has sold his colt to Alfred Vandensen.

O. D. Wood has a model farmhouse on his farm near Norwood.

This has been a fine fall for farmers to fix up things, and most have taken advantage of it.

Pleasant Valley.

Dec. 30.—W. C. Burdick is spending the holidays with his parents and other relatives in Kalamazoo county.

Noble and Nigle Burdick attended the union Christmas tree at the Congregational church at Boyne City and helped make the music with their violins. They reported a pleasant time and the gift of a nice present.

The Pleasant Valley Educational Club met at John Newville's on Christmas day and a pleasant time was enjoyed by all, especially the children, whom Mrs. Newville always takes special pains to please.

Eveline.

A happy New Year to all.

Joe Tuttle is still quite sick. On Monday it was reported that he was much worse and the doctor was again sent for.

Geo. Jerman went to Petoskey Monday night on a visit to his father and uncle.

C. H. Whitford and son of Undine were in town Sunday.

A compositor on the JOURNAL made us state that a son was born to Mr. and Mrs. J. Tuttle. It should have read "Trudgeon." We beg pardon Joe.

Ellsworth.

Dec 31.—A New Year's greeting to the Journal.

Within the past three weeks there has been three new cases of diphtheria, Mrs. Brooks is almost well, but Ezra VanOrman lost his only little daughter, and now his youngest boy is severely ill with the same disease.

Mr. Muirhead of Alba has sent men and teams here to draw his lumber from Fulton's mill to South Arm where it can be shipped next spring.

Barnard.

The Grangers gave a supper for their friends here on New Year's night.

Cyntha Bogart is quite sick.

There was no church or Sunday school Sunday on account of the weather.

We hear that Mr. James Cook is very low.

If He Could Only Fill It.

Little Mary is a good little girl nearly 5 years old, but possessed of a poetical genius which runs rather too strongly toward paraphrasing. She has done a good deal of composing during her brief existence, but mainly in the way of words substituted for others, which left her open to the charge of plagiarism. She is also possessed of a fund of humor which would not be expected in one so young. Mary's father the other day, by way of breaking the child of her fault as a poet and testing her capacity at original composition, offered her as a Christmas present the largest and best picture book that could be found in Chicago if she would make up a piece of poetry which would not resemble any other that she had ever heard. She was given two days to complete the task, and yesterday morning sang the following as her original composition:

Hang up papa's stocking,
Be sure you don't forget;
If Santa Claus can fill it,
We'll all be wealthy yet.

It is needless to say that Mary lost the prize, her father pronouncing the poem a parody, and one which showed reckless disregard for the truth on the part of the child.—Chicago Herald.

Millais a Gold Digger.

Few people know that Sir John Millais, the great English artist, was for a short time a gold digger in the Australian colonies. Young John Millais, some thirty-five years ago, caught the gold fever, and, abandoning pro tem his career as an artist, sailed for Melbourne. The present prime minister was one of his companions de voyage. But John Millais, although he roughed it bravely and turned the soil over with all the frenzied industry of the gold seeker, had in the end to confess to disappointment. He put in three months at the diggings, and then returned a sadder and wiser man to England.—Montreal Star.

A False Pretense.

"Well, my son," asked Jimmy Tuffboy's mother, "are you satisfied with your Christmas?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied Jimmy, "only the skates isn't nickel plated, and dad said he'd buy me a double ripper, an' I didn't see it."

"But I am sure you have been happy all day, James."

"I wasn't going to let the fellers know how bad I felt."—Exchange.

Too Near the First of the Month.

"One thing I've got against Christmas."

"What's that?"

"It comes too late in the month."

"How does that affect it?"

"Why, when a man's wife gives him a splendid present the bill is sent to him in about a week. It would be better if he had about three weeks to get ready for it."—Christmas.

An Old English Custom.

Among customs now disused, a ceremony existed at the court of England as late as the reign of Charles II of bringing a branch of the Glastonbury thorn, which usually blossoms on Christmas eve, in procession, and presenting it, with great pomp, to the king and queen on Christmas morning.—New York Post.

Received Some Himself.

"Have a cigar, Charley?"

"Don't care if I do."

"Some that my wife gave me for a Christmas present."

"Er, come to think of it, Tom, I guess I don't feel like smoking today."—Exchange.

"Yes," said the spouse, who kept a retail store, "Santa Claus is welcome, but I do not want to see the rain dear."—Exchange.

Detroit Free Press Souvenir.

One of the handsomest souvenirs we have seen for many days has just been received from the Detroit Free Press. Sixteen large pages besides illuminated cover are filled with choice miscellany and fine engravings, appealing to the highest and noblest sentiments of young and old. Accompanying the souvenir is a picture 14x20, suitable for framing, full of every-day life and reality, a scene to be found in many homes, a small boy teaching his pet dog the a, b, c's.

The household department of the Weekly Free Press has been enlarged and improved, and has been placed in editorial charge of Mrs. Eva Best, a favorite writer, whose name is known everywhere among women. Incorporated with the Household is a new department, merry times for girls and boys, which is delightfully conducted by Mrs. Margaret Eytinge. The Household will hereafter be published in separate form—a complete paper in itself—and will be mailed as a supplement to the Weekly Free Press. It will be nicely illustrated.

THE STORY OF A MARE.

She Slept in the Kitchen and Knew When It Was Necessary to Fire Up.

A well known man who lives not far from Newcastle, Me., told me of an experience he had a few winters since with a horse of which he was very fond. He was driving across Jefferson pond one afternoon when the mare went through the ice. In an instant the sleigh also went under. The gentleman managed to get out of the water himself after a valiant struggle, when, finding himself upon a firm footing, he turned his attention to the horse. After a long time, the assistance of two men was secured, and, even then, nearly an hour elapsed before the poor horse was rescued, thoroughly chilled and exhausted.

Not far off, her owner had a friend who lived in the old fashioned house in which I listened to the story, a house with a cellar kitchen.

He led the mare straight into this kitchen where she laid down, gladly enough, before a big, blazing open fire.

Warm blankets were thrown over the poor creature, and hot drinks were given her. Then her owner, pretty well chilled and tired out himself, passed into a bedroom on the same floor and soon fell asleep. About midnight he was awakened by something passing over the bed clothes. He felt a little startled. Then he felt a warm breath upon his face, and, lo! the mare had come into the room to find her master and thank him, for she fell to licking his face gently!

Her owner was manly enough to own up that he was so touched that he cried over her. Finally he rose, led her back to the kitchen, threw a big log upon the coals, and down lay the intelligent mare, while her master, silently registering a vow that the grateful creature should never pass out of his hands, returned to his own bed. I used the expression "he was manly enough," for I share this belief of Bayard Taylor: "The bravest are tenderest."—Kate Van Twinkle in Lewiston Journal.

An Unfortunate Postcard.

The Siam papers contain an account of the imprisonment in Bangkok of a Turkish subject, named Belitski, for seven months without being brought to trial by the Siamese authorities. His offense was that, having lately arrived in Bangkok from Hong Kong, he had addressed to his wife, Mme. Charlotte Belitski, Tornovie Seimen, Eastern Rosmelia, Turkey, a postcard, on which the following was written in the German language: "Bangkok, Dec. 7, 1888.—Here everything is wild and uncivilized; the women go about half naked. All vices flourish here; a paradise for problematic existences. What a contrast to the highly civilized natives of China and Japan, where I have lately been! Siam is a genuine Wallachian country. It is the wildest country I have ever seen in my travels.—Robert Belitski." On Dec. 16 Belitski was arrested on a charge, as he understood it, of libeling the Siamese government. He was never brought to trial, and was liberated on the representations of certain British subjects. He made his way to Batavia to lay his complaint before the Turkish consul there, Turkey having no treaty with Siam.—London Standard.

Warmth and Coldness of Clothing.

Clothing possesses no warmth in itself, but, as it is more or less a poor conductor of heat, it prevents the escape of the bodily warmth. Woolen fabrics contain a large quantity of air entangled in their meshes which, being a poor conductor of heat, adds considerably to the warmth of clothing made from them. In hot weather we wear light cotton or linen clothing so as to allow as much of the bodily heat to escape as possible. There is a prejudice in favor of light colored clothing for summer wear, but it is hardly based on scientific grounds. Dark colored cloth is the best radiator, allowing the bodily heat to escape freely, while white clothing absorbs less of the heat radiated directly from the skin. Therefore, to dress scientifically in summer one should wear dark clothing in the shade and light clothing when exposed to the sun's rays. Practically, the matter of appearance is the only one to be considered, as the warmth or coolness of clothing is not apparently affected by its color.—Exchange.

Concrete.

The uses to which concrete made of Portland cement, sand and broken stone is being put are constantly increasing. It is cheaper than dressed stone of the better qualities and more enduring. Bridge piers have been constructed entirely of concrete, and down south they are building houses of it. It is almost time proof. A cake of Portland cement allowed to "set" under water for seven days will pull 459 pounds of tensile strength to the square inch. A block and concrete conduit is the best thing known to engineering science for a waterway. Concrete pavements are the best, and concrete is as nearly fire proof as any material used by practical builders. In fact, the discovery of this chemical combination is one of the most valuable that has been made in the past ten years.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

One Way to Cook a Rabbit.

A couple of Augusta disciples of Nimrod, while on a recent gunning trip, after a hard day's tramp succeeded in bagging a small rabbit. They knew that the animal was good eating, but as to how to cook him properly they were not as well posted. They pondered long on the subject until the pangs of hunger demanded immediate action of some sort, when they tied bunny up by the hind legs and picked him as the good housewife does a hen. They said he was good eating just the same, with the exception of an occasional tuft of fur which had escaped the picking process.—Kennebec Journal.

A Child's Answer.

His father stocked him on the head
And asked him who St. Nick would be.
"I don't know Santa Claus," he said,
"But that's Christ Kringle I know well."

—New York Sun.

JANUARY MAGAZINES.

Scribner's.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE for January begins the fourth year and seventh volume with the promise that during the current year it will follow its well-approved course of printing articles of interest in themselves, by writers who really have something to say; and of aiming that great variety shall be secured rather than that any single undertakings shall monopolize its space.

Godey's.

"Godey's Lady's Book" (the ladies' favorite) comes to us for January looking as fresh and bright as the New Year itself. Good stories fill its pages to repletion. A handsome steel plate for a frontispiece cannot fail to please both old and young. If only one half of the promises made are carried out, and when we know from experience that all the publishers promise will be done, this certainly will be the most popular magazine published for 1890. Godey Pub. Co., Philadelphia, Pa. Price $2.

WATCH YOUR ADDRESS LABEL.

The time to which each subscription is paid is indicated by the date on the address label, and every person can see at a glance when their subscription expires. LOCAL NOTES AND NEWS.

School next Monday.

Capt. Tullock is quite sick this week.

Who "pulled the string" this time, Mr. Sentinel.

Elmore Mudge started for California on Tuesday.

☞ Fine Onions at O. W. Smith's for 75c per bushel.

Mrs. E. H. Green has been suffering with neuralgia this week.

☞ Silver Thread Saur Kraut at O. W. Smith's, for 3c per pound.

The Grand Rapids Democrat sends out an elegant almanac for 1890.

Miss May Todd returned to her home in Cheboygan on Thursday.

☞ Lace curtains cleaned equal to new. Mrs. M. Moore.

Miss Phila Wood is home from Ann Arbor for the holiday vacation.

Jakey Rosenthal is back from his holiday vacation, ready for school again.

☞ Fine Binghampton Buckwheat Flour at O. W. Smith's for 3c per pound.

School reports for Ironton and Advance are unavoidably crowded over to next week.

Alden Chamberlin got his team to the fire engine first for the fire at Swallow's house.

L. D. Bartholomew has been quite sick the past week, and is still confined to his room.

W. B. Taylor has been sick for two weeks, but is now improving and will soon be out again.

We are glad to hear that the Sentinel "don't have to" cover itself with any more mortgages.

☞ An umbrella was left at Cochran's drug store recently. The owner can have the same by proving property and paying for this notice.

☞ Lost—a silk umbrella with a gold handle, January 1st, at the party at Mr. Fox's. The person having it will please return to Alick Rosenthal's store.

☞ Aldrich Sisters will sell fall and winter hats at cost for the next 30 days, to reduce stock. Now is the time to get a bargain in the best goods. Call and see.

"The big four" has been repeated in Charlevoix county."—Sentinel. And they are still on top; from present appearances they are likely to stay there for a while.

The fine printing of the Chicago Weekly Herald makes its illustrations—unexcelled by those of any other newspaper — very attractive. The Herald is only One Dollar per year.

Get ready for the next Young Peoples' social at the home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Fox, Jan. 7th, 8 to 10 P. M. Explosive amusements will be served for refreshments. Good music. Literary entertainment, etc., etc. All for 10 cents.

Bake & Son have an elegant new family sleigh to be used by O. D. Wood and family as soon as there is sufficient snow. It is low, broad and commodious, and the front seat is upholstered and has high, comfortable backs.

The 18th birthday of Miss Florence M. Smith and Mr. Bert A. Fox was celebrated on the evening of January 1st, by a joint reception at the residence of Amos Fox. The entertainment included games, music, and recitations, followed by refreshments. All present report an enjoyable evening.

"What a joke it would be if Anderson should retain Hon. Will A Norton to defend him in the perjury case. Two to one he could acquit."—Sentinel. Not much of a joke, either. It would simply be in line with other recent transactions, in which the "big four" show their strength.

Our club offer with the Weekly Free Press for $1.60 is cheaper than any stale ready print, unless a man gets trusted for the ready print, and never intends to pay. If you want only the local news, take the JOURNAL at $1.00. If you want more, get the best and most for your money, by taking the Weekly Free Press also for $1.60.

On Tuesday night Charlevoix had a narrow escape from another big loss. Chas. See, janitor at the city hall, had been in the library all the evening. After closing he went to the residence of his father, and remained a few minutes. On returning to the hall he saw a light in the register in the jail, and on examination found the woodwork around the register ablaze. Having water handy, the fire was soon extinguished, but not until it had turned and charred several feet space of the floor. Had he been absent a few minutes longer, the building would undoubtedly have been destroyed. It is supposed that the fire was caused by forcing the heat from the north furnace, past the jail register which was closed, and through a long pipe to the library. The south double furnace had not been properly cleaned during the summer, and was so clogged that it smoked, which is given as the reason for forcing the heat from the north furnace to the library.

For the last six years the Sentinel has characterized the editor of the JOURNAL as a "jack-in-the-box" useful only for the amusement of some political manipulator, utterly devoid of any mental self control, the weak tool or cats paw of somebody; but the Sentinel never intimates who this manipulator is. Now we demand the particulars. Who is the real manager of the Journal? Who dictates its policy and looks after its finances? Who determines what to denounce or what to let alone? Answer these questions, Mr. Sentinel, before you talk any more about a "jack-in-the-box" bobbing up when someone "pulls the string."

Late Locals.

The Journal being a day late again this week, we are able to report that a fire started in C. E. Swallow's house about 10 o'clock this (Friday) morning. Mrs. Swallow happened to be in the yard and saw smoke issuing from a chamber window, and gave the alarm. The fire started where the pipe passed through a wall, and extended to the floor above, spreading out between the joist. A prompt response of neighbors and a ready supply of water extinguished the fire. Damage estimated at $100, fully insured.

It was reported Friday noon that Roswell Mudge fallen from a load of wood and broken an arm, but we have not learned particulars.

I. O. O. F Installation and Banquet.

The following officers for Round Lake Lodge No. 293 I.O. O. F. were installed last Wednesday evening, Jan. 1st, for the ensuing term:

N. G.—Alick Rosenthal.
V. G.—Geo. W. Cook.
R. Sec.—Chas. J. Strang.
P. Sec.—John Burns.
Treas.—L. D. Bartholomew.
R. S. N. G.—James Washburn.
L. S. N. G.—J. M. Thompson.
W.—Joseph Benavais.
C.—James E. Wood.
R. S. S.—E. Wenzel.
L. S. S.—Joseph Benavais.
O. G.—Isaac Mills.
I. G.—A. Cameron.
R. S. V. G.—Chas. E. Swallow.
L. S. V. G.—Lewis Giddings.

After the installation ceremonies were concluded the wives of the members proceeded in a body, armed with all the etceteras of a first-class supper, and surprised the husbands by demanding admittance to the hall. After the astonished brothers learned the mission of the visitors, the doors were opened wide and all went harmonious and happy until midnight.

Capital Increased.

The Charlevoix Savings Bank has been reorganized under the new state banking law, and on Jan. 1st, increased its capital to $40,000, fully paid up. The officers remain the same. A list of the stock holders and directors will be published next week.

All banks organized under the new state banking law are subject to the same restrictions as national banks, being under the immediate supervision of the state bank commissioner, appointed by the governor. Depositors are secured to an amount double the capital stock of the bank. The business and profits of the bank will undoubtedly increase in the full proportion of the new capital.

Congregational Church.

At the Congregational church next Sunday morning, sermon followed by reception of members and communion service. Sermon in the evening. Young Peoples praise and devotional meeting at 6 p.m. The week of prayer will be observed.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

(The JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns in which it is not represented. Give us all the news in as brief and concise manner as possible. Correspondence should be in the office not later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality.)

Boyne City.

JAN. 1.—Rain, and no sleighing which makes every one feel poor. But in spite of the hard times the little god Cupid has been getting in his work lively during the holiday season, many of our young people responding by willingly accepting Hymen's fetters.

On Dec. 26th Mr. B. Lyke of Boyne City and Miss Lena House of Deer Lake. By the Rev. J. Burdge, at the residence of the bride's father.

At East Jordan, Dec. 22d, Mr. G M. Lalond of East Jordan and Miss Ollie Lewis of Boyne City.

In the M. E. Church, Dec. 25, by the Rev. J. Burdge, Mr. James Pickel and Miss Minnie Campbell, both of Wilson.

J. M. Harris started for Lansing Christmas morning to attend the State Teachers' Convention held at that place. Mrs. H. spending the holidays with her parents in Ironton.

While rolling logs in the Haywood camp Fred Deitz had the misfortune to break one of his legs.

The Christmas trees were a success in both churches; the presents being plenty and some very nice and all seemed to have a good time.

J. S. Thatcher of Grand Rapids is visiting the family of S. B. Thatcher of this place.

A good deal of excitement prevails at Bay Springs over a family disturbance resulting in the husband injuring his wife through beating her until a physician had to be called, who reports a serious case. Such cases should not escape the notice of the civil authorities.

O, Sam!! Sam!! I never imagined for a moment that the three of the "big four" who followed me as witness in the Anderson examination would be pardonable to corroborate my testimony.

Ironton.

Christmas passed off very quietly in this vicinity, not even a wedding to liven things up. The only thing worth mentioning being the tree at the Congregational church on Christmas day which was a very pleasant affair.

Mrs. Mitchell, wife of James Mitchell sen., died Saturday after a long illness with consumption. She leaves a husband and a large family to mourn. The funeral was held at the Congregational church Sunday afternoon.

Miss Ella Kimball is in Charlevoix this week visiting friends.

Mr. Parker sold a fine hog to W. S. Stripp last week.

Mr. Thorp purchased a fine five-year-old colt of Dan Caten of East Jordan one day last week, and as Will Thorp was trying to draw a load of wood Monday morning with him and another horse the dashboard came out of the wagon and hitting the colt on the heels they ran away throwing Will off the load and breaking pretty badly. They were finally stopped near Mr. Thorp's home with a pretty badly wrecked wagon.

Miss Lenzena Box who has been away for the past year is home on a two weeks visit. Her many friends are glad to see her again.

Charley Howard came home from Frankfort Sunday evening where he went five or six weeks ago to work in the camp. He reports the camps breaking up on account of no snow.

Advance.

Dec. 30.—Although it rained all day the day before Christmas yet the evening was beautiful and Santa Claus could have had no excuse for neglecting the little folks, and we hope that he made them all happy.

Some of our young people went to East Jordan Christmas eve and others went to Boyne City.

John Lloyd has been on the war path and has had one fight with the noble red man which resulted in a tie. He hopes that by next spring he will be respectably decorated with feathers and will have several scalps hanging to his belt.

Peter Karleskin met with a severe accident while felling a tree last Friday. The tree striking him on the side of the right knee giving it a bad wrench which may lay him up for some time.

Several of our citizens attended the Masonic social at Boyne City last Friday night.

Van Neweille of Pleasant Valley, looking as pleasant as ever, was in town last Saturday.

Quite a number of our citizens seem to have secured jobs of holding down counters at Munson's.

Wilson.

Nice Weather.

Happy New Year to all.

Christmas was the pleasantest day of the year.

Bula Vance is convalescent.

Meb Healey, Joe Moore and families go to Clam Lake to spend New Years.

H. E. Scofield of South Arm called on relatives here on Sunday.

Joseph Cooper, R. Sherman and families moved into the house by the mill on Thursday. Joe runs the mill while Mr. S. will engineer.

Saints held services Christmas day at the Sedgeman school house. In the evening an ordinance meeting was held at Meb Healey's, where feet-washing and communion was performed.

Thomas Shepherd, sr., had several bad spells Monday and Tuesday.

Inwood.

Nash will begin to stock his Banks mill with logs next week on wheels.

McGeagh is grinding feed at his mill.

Miss Della Patten of Boyne spent Sunday with the family of O. D. Hilton.

Amasa Sanburn is building a house on his own land east of Alfred Vandenesse's, and will soon move on.

O. D. Wood had two horses gored by a bull last week.

Wm. Evans has sold his colt to Alfred Vandemen.

O. D. Wood has a model farmhouse on his farm near Norwood.

This has been a fine fall for farmers to fix up things, and most have taken advantage of it.

Pleasant Valley.

Dec. 30.—W. C. Burdick is spending the holidays with his parents and other relatives in Kalamazoo county.

Noble and Nigle Burdick attended the union Christmas tree at the Congregational church at Boyne City and helped make the music with their violins. They reported a pleasant time and the gift of a nice present.

The Pleasant Valley Educational Club met at John Newville's on Christmas day and a pleasant time was enjoyed by all, especially the children, whom Mrs. Newville always takes special pains to please.

Eveline.

A happy New Year to all.

Joe Tuttle is still quite sick. On Monday it was reported that he was much worse and the doctor was again sent for.

Geo. Jarman went to Petoskey Monday night on a visit to his father and uncle.

C. H. Whitford and son of Undine were in town Sunday.

A compositor on the JOURNAL made us state that a son was born to Mr. and Mrs. J. Tuttle. It should have read "Trudgeon." We beg pardon Jos.

Ellsworth.

Dec. 31.—A New Year's greeting to the Journal.

Within the past three weeks there has been three new cases of diphtheria, Mrs. Brooks is almost well, but Ezra Vandemas lost his only little daughter, and now his youngest boy is severely ill with the same disease.

Mr. Muirhead of Alba has sent men and teams here to draw his lumber from Fulton's mill to South Arm where it can be shipped next spring.

Barnard.

The Grangers gave a supper for their friends here on New Year's night.

Cyntha Bogart is quite sick.

There was no church or Sunday school Sunday on account of the weather.

We hear that Mr. James Cook is very low.

FACTS VS. FANCIES.

Who Pays the Tariff Tax?—The Effect of Taking the Tariff off Hides.

From the Petoskey Democrat.

The great argument of protectionists to prove that the tariff is not a tax is that the foreigner pays the tariff. Such an argument is an insult to common sense. When the Petoskey merchant wants goods he sends to his wholesale dealer for them. That dealer sends them. The Petoskey merchant pays the wholesale cost, pays the cost of packing, freight, the drayage; and all this goes to make up the first cost on which the retailer's profit is charged.

So with the New York importer. He sends abroad for goods when he wants them. When they arrive in New York he pays the freight across the ocean, he pays the first cost, he goes to the custom house and pays the tariff before he can get the goods out of the bonded warehouse. He adds these several sums together and this is the cost to him. On this he computes his profit when he sells to the wholesaler. The wholesaler charges his profit, and so on to the retailer. Not only do you, when you buy the goods, pay the tariff which the importer originally paid, but the profit on the same charged by the several dealers through whose hands it passed.

Now is a good time to do a little solid thinking. Don't "ess" the retail dealer; he only makes a living profit. Don't ess the wholesaler or the importer; these parties are necessary for the distribution of the goods. Don't talk about Patrons of Industry stores at a ten per cent profit; your sugar would cost you a cent a pound more than it does now, for the grocer loses money on every pound he sells. A ten dollar suit of clothes would come less than a dollar cheaper. Go to the root of the difficulty.

You went to the store to-day and bought a pound of smoking tobacco. On it was a great big green stamp. You know very well that the manufacturer charged up the cost of that stamp to you, and he pulled out you the price of the stamp more than it otherwise would. You see this is a tax, don't you? You also went to Rosenthal's and bought a pair of woolen stockings for your little girl to wear to school. Rosenthal sold you, at a small profit, exactly what he bought of the wholesaler, and the wholesaler sold just what he bought of the manufacturer, and the manufacturer—well, he can't get the wool, it is not grown in the United States, and the protective tariff won't make it grow. He puts in shoddy, and a tariff of 107 per cent on knit goods prevents the importation of honest, all-wool goods. What a glorious thing is this tariff! It protects Carnegie, but sends your little girl to school through the snow and storms, clad in shoddy, cotton, and republican tariff.

The 75 cents you paid for that pair of stockings represents 30 cents stockings and 45 cents republican tariff. You can't get the one without the other. Which is the heavier tax, and which had you rather have abolished, the revenue stamp on the pound of tobacco or the tariff on wool?

But, you say, the tariff on wool protects the farmer from the pauper wool grower of South America and Australia. Go to Texas and New Mexico, where land costs nothing, sheep run at large the year around and are herded and sheared by Indians and Mexicans, and talk about the pauper wool growers of South America and Australia! These western wool growers can, with wool at 20 cents per pound, become enormously wealthy in a few years. Can Emmet county farmers do this?

But little over half the wool consumed in the United States is raised here. Certain grades cannot be raised here for the same reason that peanuts cannot be profitably raised in Petoskey. The protective tariff cut not change nature, nor cause animals to thrive when conditions of climate and food are against them.

Along in the seventies congress abolished the tariff on hides. What a howl went up. One would have thought all the cattle in the United States would have been killed off by the pauper cattle of South America. But they didn't; cattle lived and thrived and people made money out of them. The shoe factories doubled and trebled and quadrupled their capacity. Shoes are cheap and good. We manufacture all we need in the United States and last year we exported $9,000,000 worth. We control the most trade of the world. The packers of Chicago fix the price of beef in London. Was the tariff on hides removed to benefit the people of the United States? Not much. The congress that did it was republican. Texas was the center of the cattle industry, and Texas was persistently democratic. It was simply a punishment on Texas democrats, that was all, but the outcome proves the fallacy of the whole protective system.

Remove the tariff on wool, and not only would the sheep industry thrive, but, in ten years, every man, woman and child would be clothed in good, nice woolen goods of American manufacture, and at half cost of the shoddy cotton-wool stuff now worn.

What Is Light?

Several theories have been advanced by scientists to account for the fact that we have light. The two principles of the many reasons given by these learned gentlemen are the emission or corpuscular theory, and that known as the undulatory theory. The principles of the emission theory originated in the fertile brain of Rene Descartes, the philosopher, who was born in 1596. But little attention was given the theory, and it and Descartes were both almost forgotten when the same theory was enunciated and worked out by Sir Isaac Newton, about sixty years later.

According to these eminent men, light consists of small particles emitted by luminous bodies, the velocity of its transmission mainly regulating its color.

The undulatory theory, the one now generally accepted by the scientific world, tells us that the space between the celestial bodies is occupied by an impalpable ether. The luminousness of a body is supposed to be due to a rapid, vibratory motion proceeding from the body in question to the eye. The waves of the light proceed in all directions from every point in space in straight lines, the motion of its particles being supposed to undulate in a transverse direction to the line in which the light travels. The velocity of light is so great that the human mind cannot grasp an idea of the rapidity with which it travels; by the best authorities attainable to the writer, the distance traveled by light in one single second of time is 192,000 miles, a distance so great that no perceptible space of time would be occupied in its passage between any two given points on the earth's surface.—St. Louis Republic.

Eating Snails.

The stories about Frenchmen eating snails are believed by many people to have no foundation in fact, but to be only a phase of the exaggeration in which Yankees are apt to indulge, in describing the queer things they see to be met with on foreign dining tables. Nevertheless it is a fact that nearly 100,000 pounds of snails are sold daily in the Paris markets to be eaten by dwellers in Paris. They are carefully reared for the purpose in extensive snail gardens in the provinces and fed on aromatic herbs to make their flavor finer. One snailery in Dijon is said to bring in to its proprietor 7,000 francs a year. Many Swiss cantons also contain large snail gardens where they are grown with much pains. They are not only regarded as a great delicacy, but are reckoned as very nutritious. Hygienists say they contain 17 per cent. of nitrogenous matter, and that they are equal to oysters in nutritive properties. Snails are also extensively used as an article of food in Austria, Spain, Italy and Egypt and the countries on the African side of the Mediterranean. Indeed, the habit of eating snails as food has existed in various parts of the world for many centuries.—Good Housekeeping.

Running Amuck in Borneo.

A curious case of amuck took place recently at Sarakhan, the capital of British North Borneo. The governor held a durbar at Government house, at which about one hundred and fifty native chiefs were present. At the close of the meeting outdoor sports were held, and during the progress of these one of the men became excited, drew his sword, and began to attack every one in his way. He first cut and slashed at an Englishman who was not looking toward him, and then pursued his way rapidly through the crowd, slitting right and left. He missed another European, wounded two Sikhs, and rushed at a Sikh sergeant major, who, having a stick in his hand, struck the man's forearm and forced him to drop his sword. He was then seized, put in irons, and his disastrous progress thus terminated.—London Times.

Goddard's Marks.

We have previously told several good stories of Col. John Goddard, who was a king among the Penobscot lumbermen in his day. The Dexter Gazette tells more. Goddard sent large crews into the woods every year. As soon as he had hired his man he started him off for the woods at his expense. He always furnished transportation, together with food and lodging while on the way. He franked the men through, as it were. Upon the back of each he scrawled a few chalk marks, and a man bearing that superscription was entitled to all the privileges of the camp line or hotel conduct. John Goddard settled the tariff and paid the scrip. Furthermore, no man was allowed by the woods boss unless he could show about and show Goddard's bold chirography in the vicinity of his spread eagle.—Lewiston Journal.

Due to Nasal Difficulties.

A Dutch physician declares that a close connection exists between the exercise of mental faculties and disorders of the nose. He says that, if it were generally known how many caused chronic headache, of inability to learn or to perform mental work, were due to chronic disease of the nose, many cases of them would be easily cured.—New York Telegram.

A Daily Paper FOR 1 Cent a Day.

A daily newspaper now costs but little more than the old-time weekly. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an impartial, independent newspaper. It is a member of the Associated Press. It prints all the news and sells it for 1 cent a day. Mailed, postpaid, for $3.00 per year, or 25 cents per month. This is $3.00 per year less than the price of any other Chicago morning paper. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is not a blanket-sheet. It is a condensed paper. You can read it and still have time left for an hour's work. It is a daily paper for busy people. No one who has the advantage of a daily mail service need longer be content with a weekly newspaper. The circulation of the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is, with a single exception, the largest in the United States—it exceeds that of all other Chicago dailies combined. You ought to read a daily paper. Why not try the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS? No. 81

The Charlevoix Savings Bank.

Last week the Journal mentioned the reorganization of this bank under Act No. 205, Public Acts of 1887, and the increase of the paid up capital to $40,000. To better show the actual prosperity of the bank it will be necessary to look at its history.

The bank was organized Aug. 4, 1884, with a capital of $25,000, only 60 per cent of which ($15,000) was paid up. On Jan 7th, 1889, the bank issued to its stockholders paid-up certificates, after paying its own expenses, interest, and taxes, showing a profit of 40 per cent of the capital in four years and five months. On June 30, 1889, the bank paid to the stockholders its first semi-annual dividend of five per cent. On Dec 31, 1889, a second semi-annual dividend of four per cent was paid.

Under the present banking law the stockholder is responsible to depositors for an amount double his stock. This makes, with the paid-up capital and individual responsibility, a guarantee fund of $80,000 to secure depositors in this bank.

The bank is required by law to keep on hand at all times a specified reserve fund. The Michigan banking law, to which the "Savings bank" must conform, is said to be more favorable to depositors than the national banking law, on account of the added responsibility of stockholders. At least four statements must be published each year, at the call of the state bank commissioner.

The stockholders of the reorganized bank are E. H. Green, A. Buttars, A. Fox, Henry Bennett Estate, Abbie T. Bennett, J. L. Hurd, F. W. Mayne, H. V. Rifenburg, F. E. Lewis, L. E. Allen, and F. A. Smith, of Charlevoix; John Saveland of Milwaukee; W. H. Gray of Chicago; S. S. Walker and Edwin E. White of St. Johns; and G. H. Hill of Cincinnati.

The officers for this year are:

President—E. H. Green.
Vice President—A. Buttars.
Cashier—F. A. Smith.

Board of Directors—E. H. Green, A. Buttars, A. Fox, F. W. Mayne, L. E. Allen, and F. A. Smith, of Charlevoix; John Saveland of Milwaukee; S. S. Walker of St. Johns; and W. H. Gray of Chicago.

The board of directors have adopted a new set of by-laws in conformity with the state banking law, a copy of which anyone can procure by calling at the bank.

The character and standing of the above stockholders is a sufficient guarantee of the bank. The showing of profits for the past ought to be a safe index as to the future under the same management. Every citizen of Charlevoix should rejoice at their prosperity and prospects.

The C. & W. M. R. R.

The surveying party of the C. & W. M. R. R., fourteen in number, in charge of Engineer H. B. Hodges has located the line from Traverse City via Acme, Williamsburg and Spencer Creek to one and one half miles south of Bellaire, and is pushing the survey northward at the rate of about a mile a day. The line as far as located is an exceptionally good one, with easy grades and long tangents, and the branch between Williamsburg and Elk Rapids is equally good. Engineer H. F. Northrup arrived here yesterday and the route beyond Bellaire will be determined upon further examination. Two lines are under consideration—one running northward near the D. G. & E. survey, and another up the Cedar river and down the Green and Jordan rivers to East Jordan. The surveying party is now encamped at Bellaire.—Bellaire Breeze.

The Detroit Tribune having asserted that the democrats of Michigan need a stronger organ in Detroit the Cadillac News and Express (also republican) unfeelingly retorts: "As to the ability of the papers, the republicans of the state as a whole certainly have no advantage over the democrats, if indeed they would not suffer by a close comparison."

The best indorsement the Journal has had for months is the vigorous kick some republicans make against the large proportion of political matter given every week. Every democrat in the county should be a subscriber to the Journal, and should pay in advance. One of the principal elements of strength in the republican party is the generous support given to its party press.

Washington Letter.

General Hancock uttered a great truth, when he said a few days after he was nominated for the presidency "the tariff is a local issue." If evidence had been necessary to prove this statement it has been supplied in large quantities by the statements made to the house committee on ways and means in the hearing now going on upon the proposed new tariff bill which the republicans of that committee are engaged in preparing. For instance, the New England manufacturers say that unless they are given free coal and free iron ore they will shortly be ruined, while the iron and coal people of Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia and Ohio, to say nothing of others, stoutly maintain that unless the present tariff on coal and iron is kept where it is, or raised, they will be ruined, and will have to abandon their mines. When Gen. Hancock called the tariff a local issue the smart alecks thought it was because he was ignorant of the subject, but since then many able men after years of study, have arrived at exactly the same conclusion, because there is no other logical conclusion. No tariff bill that has ever been gotten up, or ever will be, will give satisfaction to the entire country. It is simply impossible because the interests of one section are always directly opposed to those of another section.

The cruiser Baltimore—the fastest war ship in the world—has been formally accepted by the navy department, and will be placed in commission as soon as she can be made ready.

Now that everbody regards it as certain that the house will pass the resolution instructing the committee on reform in the civil service to investigate the various charges made against the commission, the commissioners have begun telling folks how glad they are, and how much they court the strictest investigation. Let them wait until the investigation is ended and then tell people how they feel.

Ex-Senator Sabin, of Minnesota, is here, it is said for the purpose of trying to defeat the confirmation of certain appointments, but he denies that. All the same it will not be surprising if several ren who made themselves conspicuous in downing Mr. Sabin should find themselves in the list of rejected nominations.

Representative Moore of Texas, who is a member of the house committee on elections, thinks the large number of contested elections from the south is the direct result of a republican conspiracy to unseat enough democrats to give them a good working majority. His only hope is that the chairman of the election committee will be fair enough to put a stop to the revolutionary program. A rather slim hope.

PRACTICAL SIDE OF FREE ART.

How Fashion Affects the Price of Paintings.

The principal reason given for maintaining the present tariff upon works of art is contained in the statement that reducing the number of foreign picture imported will increase the profitability of sales of American pictures, and that the great number of French works in the market pushes out the American. Now this is one of those half truths seemingly plausible, but easily answered if considered.

To begin with, works of art appeal to the æsthetic sense, the educated taste and intellect; they are not, in the ordinary, material sense, necessary. Eminently necessary to any complete or even moderately advanced civilization, they yet are not essential to life; they are not good to eat or to wear, and they would be expensive as fuel.

Consequently, we cannot legislate the pictures of any especial nationality into the market. By putting an exhibitant duty upon foreign breadstuffs, textiles, leather, you might in any civilized country force native bread, clothes, shoes, upon the most enthusiastic advocate of foreign manufactures, because food and wearing apparel must be had. Nature and climate have settled that question; it is not left to taste. But let X be a foreign painter, Y an American painter, A, B, C, D, etc., pictures. They admire the works of X and want them; you put upon them so high a duty that A, B, C, D cannot afford to buy. Will they go and buy Y's pictures? Not at all; they do not require them. They will say, "We will wait a while till we can afford to pay the premium on X's pictures." Meanwhile, as far as A, B, C, D are concerned, the market lies idle until eventually the foreign seller profits by a still higher price.

Again, by a commercial law, sales of pictures breed other sales. Taste, the question may be raised, "Then would not multiplied sales of foreign works of art increase the passion for foreign pictures alone, to the prejudice of native ones?" This is unlikely; picture buying is largely a fashion. There are true lovers of art who appreciate as well as admire, buying the best, because they know the best and it gives them most pleasure. It is such buyers who make the continued creation of good art possible; but the mass buy because it is the fashion, A purchasing one of X's pictures because B, C and D have them, and he wishes to be correct as a collector.

Fashion is, in part at least, a fictitious thing, and by keeping up the duty on foreign pictures we deliberately increase this fashion by enhancing their prestige.

A very simply illustration may be useful; go into a hatter's and price two articles. They look equally good, but are marked $2 and $10. Why is one more expensive than the other? the buyer asks, and is answered that it is a foreign hat. Immediately, and without realizing that the duty is quite enough to make the difference, he begins to examine the hat to find out why it is the better. It feels as if it must have some hidden intrinsic value, because it costs more. The fashion for buying French pictures has its excellent origin in the fact that the splendid contemporaneous French school has produced most of the great modern masters. But fashion naturally exaggerates and sees good only in its own particular direction, and we aid it by keeping the duty up.

Take off the handicap and you enhance the prestige of native work, and prestige at home is what it needs more than anything else. Abroad its excellence is handsomely recognized. The foreign artist can live and produce more cheaply than the American, but works of art cannot be treated upon the basis of simple manufactures—the greater must include the less, and the general prestige and furtherance of native art is far more important than any consideration of the proportionate scale of daily expenses in Europe and America.

The second reason given for keeping up a duty is that otherwise cheap rubbish would flood our market. This is easily answered: first, no real artist competes with rubbish, and secondly, no duty will keep out cheap rubbish. Such work can float any duty, except an absolutely prohibitive one, and a prohibitive duty cannot be legislated because, in justice, no one can draw the line between pictures which shall be admitted or excluded. It is probable that for some time after the abolition of tariff on works of art great numbers of foreign pictures will be imported, including many bad ones; but rubbish, floated in, will find its level. The strength of the purchaser of foreign pictures is in his buying good ones; his weakness is in buying bad ones. The more bad ones are bought the sooner will more average foreign works depreciate, the sooner will the buyer weed out his collection, and the good American and good foreign pictures meet upon a common ground of sensible commercial appreciation.

Zola's Programme.

The Paris correspondent of The Dagblad of The Hague states that Emile Zola's last work, "Bete Humaine," will be followed by "L'Argent," which will deal with Bourse speculation and, to a certain extent, with politics. Then will follow "La Guerre," of course a naturalistic work, treating of the army, the war of 1870 and containing a long discussion on the surrender of Sedan. The next book will conclude the Rougon-Maquart series, and will tell us how all the characters not already killed off will end. As soon as the series is completed, which will be in 1891, M. Zola intends to devote himself exclusively to the stage. He will then be 52 years of age, and will confine himself to the production of original plays, that is to say, plays which have not been adapted from his novels. M. Zola at present regrets, continues the Chevalier Salvador (The Dagblad's correspondent in Paris), that he ever put "L'Assommoir," "Nana," or "Germinal" on the boards. He owns that he has made a mistake, and I am assured that he will never attempt to adapt "La Bete Humaine" for the Parisian or any other stage.

Memorial services were held at the Baptist church last Sunday for the three O'Brian children who died of diphtheria recently. Rev. Mr. Haynes conducted the services.

It would be impossible to make a complete list of those suffering from "la grippe," colds, sore throat, etc. There are more sick in Charlevoix than ever before at one time.

The Daily issue of the Chicago Herald is now eight, ten, twelve or pictures which shall be admitted or excluded. It is probable that for some time after the abolition of tariff on works of art great numbers of foreign pictures will be imported, including many bad ones; but rubbish, floated in, will find its level. The strength of the purchaser of foreign pictures is in his buying good ones; his weakness is in buying bad ones. The more bad ones are bought the sooner will more average foreign works depreciate, the sooner will the buyer weed out his collection, and the good American and good foreign pictures meet upon a common ground of sensible commercial appreciation.

Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach us no later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality.]

Inwood.

Ed. Cook went to Elk Rapids last week with a grist.

A. Chase is preparing to build a house in the spring.

Tom Sinclair keeps a sheep bell on his dog.

Memorial services for the children of James and Albert O'Brian were held at the Baptist church, Charlevoix, on Sunday afternoon, Rev. Mr. Haynes officiating.

The wife of James Cook is improving very slowly.

Thomas Hadden has come home to work for himself.

Geo. Eagelson, of Charlevoix has gone to Norwood to work for Nash, with Will Miller's team.

Rev. Mr. Haynes of Charlevoix will preach in the Hilton school house Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Antrim county taxes are higher than Charlevoix county taxes. Can anyone tell why? Is it because their farms are so much better in Banks than in Charlevoix county?

Alfred Vandeusen has a big flock of sheep, and he has a notion in his head that if he put bells on all of them it would keep dogs away. So he got bells enough for all, of a variety of sounds, and when the sheep get frightened they ring the bells play a grand march, and the dogs march right out of the lot. Evidently the dogs think it the Swiss bell ringers.

Mr. Charles Cummings came here about five years ago and bought the Inwood farm, on section 18. He came from the "Soo" where he now has a good farm. On the Inwood farm he has about 90 acres cleared, with stumps nearly all out. The soil is clay loam; the surface rolling, well watered with a trout creek that runs across it. There is a fine orchard that has been bearing 15 years, and a young orchard planted two years ago. Mr. Cummings has built a good barn, with a full-size basement for stock. He has two growing sons to assist him in the work, and they are this winter clearing 10 acres to be put into crops next summer.

There are some other good farmers in this vicinity who we will tell you about later.

A neighbor said the other day: "What is the matter? I voted for Cleveland in '84, and then the republicans told me in '88 if I would vote for Harrison we would have better times; plenty of work, and more money. I did so, and lots of my friends did the same, but we have not seen the good times yet that were promised us. Where will we get money to pay our taxes with? In Cleveland's time we did get a little money occasionally, but it seems impossible to now. The tax collector don't ask you how you voted,—for Cleveland or for Harrison,—but demands your cash. The republican policy of protection does not pay the farmer's taxes, nor give his family bread and butter."

We understand that Fred Smith intends running a steamboat on Pine Lake next summer.

ADVANCE SCHOOL REPORT.

School closed on Dec. 23d. No. of pupils enrolled, 34. Average daily attendance, 30. Pupils neither absent or tardy during the month of December: Hannah Von Platen, Mattie Willis, Victor Lacroix, Mabel Phillips, Willie King, Harman Martin, Joseph Morrison. Pupils neither absent nor tardy during the whole term: Hannah Von Platen and Victor Lacroix. Pupils receiving 100 percent in deportment were Mattie Willis, Hannah Von Platen and Eva Wood. Eva Wood has the honor of being perfect in spelling during the term. Monthly prizes for spelling received by Eva Wood, Josie McShea and Oscar King. Monthly prize for good behavior granted to Nellie Karlskiln. At the close of the term the copybooks were submitted to a committee of three for their inspection and decision. Committee disagreed. We find from their separate decisions that Mattie Willis, Hannah Von Platen, and Eva Wood hold preeminence in writing.

The following are the average standings for the month of December and for the term:

Beautiful snow.

Mrs. Hudkins has been quite ill since Christmas.

Terry Barber of Boyne City is visiting friends here.

Andrew Nowland and family spent New Years with relatives here.

Thomas Shepherd is still quite ill and has epileptic fits frequently.

In spite of the pouring rain Harry Hudkins "went Delong way" round on Sunday.

Little Marion Isaman had a wen or carbuncle cut from over her eye on Saturday. Also Myrtle Isaman is quite ill.

We hear that a couple (one of whom lives in this township) from Boyne City to get married Saturday evening, but that a brother of the would-be bride stopped the proceedings.

A family from Virginia have moved into a small house near Deer Lake. It consists of 26 members, 17 being children of one family, the remainder being neices and nephews of the honeholder. Next!!

James Peck and Allie Campbell were married last week. We hear that the bride is too youthful. Query. Is our license law of any use? Cannot anyone swear to the proper age and procure a license?

Mr. and Mrs. Kinney of Boyne City passed through here on their way to Echo and back last week. The many friends of Mrs. K. will be sorry to learn that she is suffering from ulceration of the gums and other diseases of the jaw.

A question for our orthographers. Have the city fathers any right to spell East Jordan J-o-r-d-o-n when for thousands of years Jordan has been spelt with an a?

Ironton.

Jan. 7.—Looks a little more like winter this morning, the snow is still falling and we are in hopes that we will get a sleigh ride yet this winter.

Joe Tuttle has been dangerously sick for some time with inflamation of the lungs, but we hear that he is now some better. Dr. Foster is attending him.

They have the mumps at Martin Staley's.

School closes in the Mountain district this week Friday.

The chicken pie social at the M. E. church New Years eve was a success; $14 was realized for the pastor for whose benefit the social was held.

The young people of Ironton gave a literary entertainment at the school house on Saturday evening with a very entertaining program. We are glad to see a literary society formed in Ironton and hope it will succeed.

Quite a number of the old pioneers met by invitation at Henry Hammond New Years day and partook of a bountiful dinner which Mrs. H. knows so well how to provide. A day of enjoyment for all.

The following is the report of the Ironton schools for the term ending Dec. 20, 1889: Whole number enrolled 118; grammar department, 45, primary department, 73.

Jan. 7—Our schools opened after the holiday vacation on Monday the 6th.

The G. A. R. boys of Walter Clifford post will give Major Miller a social supper on the evening of January 15th, in honor of his removal in the near future to Kansas City.

Mr. S. Hooker and wife of Rochester, N. Y., were the guests of R. R. Perkins from Friday of last week until Monday, during which time they "did" Boyne, expressing themselves well pleased with its location and surroundings. Mrs. Hooker is Mr. P.'s aunt.

There was a wedding at the U. S. hotel on Monday morning. The parties live in Ironton.

The second silver medal contest under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. of this place will be held in the Presbyterian church Wednesday evening Jan. 15th.

It snowed a little more to-day. It is wonderful how the long faces have brightened up.

"A Blessing in Disguise."

Editor Journal,—I see on the eighth page of the last Sentinel an article headed "A Blessing in Disguise," which is ably written, but I think the writer confined his own county farmers in not saying anything about them, and "soft-soaping" the Banks farmers. I guess the Sentinel man is going to take a trip through Banks, and thinks the Banks farmers will feed him on turkey. I know the Charlevoix farmers would stuff him full of turkey if he would say half as much for them as he did for Banks farmers. I think the Sentinel man might find a few good farmers in his own county if he would look around him. [What is the matter with Robt. Trimble, Jos. Clark, sr., John Simpson, sr., G. D. Hilton, Ed Cook, McIntire, Stafford, and numerous others who have made farming and fruit growing a success?—Ed. Journal] The Sentinel should not go back on ties and posts. When he comes

The Disingenuous Blaine.

From Mr. Blaine, the politician, the country ceased long since to expect anything in the way of real candor or fairness in the discussion of questions having a partisan bearing or aspect. As a politician he is what is known as "a slick article," and his methods are those he employed in the Mulligan case, by which he will be remembered longer than by anything else in his somewhat checkered career. But from Mr. Blaine posing as a publicist we have a right to expect —and undoubtedly do expect—something better. In his book he gave them something better; but in his controversy with Mr. Gladstone in the current North American Review, which it was natural to suppose would be conducted on the same high plane—he has resorted to the cheapest sophistries and to petty fogging that would shame a backwoods lawyer trying a dog case.

In this discussion Mr. Blaine has the advantage of the defensive. He has all Mr. Gladstone's argument before him in advance. Yet he can find no better answer to Mr. Gladstone's suggestion that free trade having proven a great thing for England, would be likely to prove a great thing for America, than to say that "Alaska excepted, the northernmost point of the union is sixty miles south of the southernmost point of Great Britain, and the southernmost point of the union is but little more than 100 miles from the tropics." He is careful not to say that he regards this as a conclusive argument —in fact, he is a little shy about presenting it as argument at all. He is conscious perhaps, that if it was seriously presented as an argument somebody would be sure to follow him with the claim that the geographical condition hypothesis makes the rule of three and monogamy inapplicable in America, notwithstanding the success with which they have met in Great Britain. Yet if he puts no reliance on the geographical fact as an argument why does he present it? Is it for the purpose of scenting the cheap applause of those narrow minded people who regard the length and breadth and height of the United States as a sufficient excuse for holding that we are a peculiar people in whose behalf all the laws and rules that hold good in other lands have been abrogated? If this is his hope it is a pity he did not explain to his audience how it is that Florida enjoys and profits by free trade with Minnesota notwithstanding the immense difference in latitude.

This, however, is a mild offense on Mr. Blaine's part compared with the deliberate misstatements he makes concerning the effects of free trade in this country. When he says that from 1812 to 1861 "free trade tariffs were thrice followed by industrial stagnation, by financial embarrassments, by distress among all classes dependent for subsistence upon their own labor," he deliberately misstates unless he can be suspected of intending to shelter himself behind the quibble that he does not mean to affirm that the free trade tariffs caused the financial panics and distress that followed. With a less tricky man than Blaine such a supposition would be impossible. It is only so in his case because he practically closes the door by adding to his statement that "thrice were these burdens (occasioned by free trade) removed by the enactment of protective tariffs."

Nothing could well be further from the truth than this indictment of free trade so called. It cannot truthfully be said that free trade tariffs were even "followed" by a panic thrice in the period Mr. Blaine names. Prior to 1833 there was no tariff that can justly be called free trade; and there has been none since 1861. The panics of 1837 and 1857 are, therefore, the only ones that can be said with any approach to accuracy to have followed free trade tariffs. The first of these—the tariff of 1833—was a compromise tariff and was introduced by Henry Clay, the "father of the American system." It would not be regarded now as a free trade tariff, the chief features being the sliding scale under which duties were set to be reduced each alternate year till 1842, after which the highest rate was to be 20 per cent. on the home valuation. The average of the duties under this tariff from 1833 to 1842 was about 32 per cent; and it had been in operation nearly four years when the crash of 1837 came. If the tariff was the cause of that crash Mr. Blaine is the first to make the discovery. If it had been known in 1840 the knowledge would undoubtedly have been used in the presidential campaign of that year, which was as stubbornly contested as any that has been fought since. The hard times were availed of, the Whigs making the most of them; but there was no claim on their part that the tariff was responsible. The Whigs were not then unanimous in the support of protection, and even when they had gotten into power, partly, as already intimated, through the judicious use of the "hard times" argument, they made no proposition to return to the protective policy. Mr. Clay, who was unquestionably the Whig leader, insisted in the extra session of 1841 upon carrying out the compromise and openly declared that there was no "necessity of protection." And although the tariff was changed in 1842 when the Whig tariff was passed the crash had practically spent its force, and there was no pretense that the change was necessitated by it. The change was a trifling one at most. The average on dutiable goods was only carried up from 32 per cent. to 33.

Two years later, in 1844, began the agitation for reduced tariff taxation which resulted, in 1846, in the "Walker tariff," the nearest approach we have ever had in this country to free trade. It was while this tariff remained in force that the crash of 1857 came, which is undoubtedly one of the periods of distress and ruin to which Mr. Blaine refers as "following" a free trade tariff, a few changes having been made that very year in the direction of reducing duties. But it certainly was not the opinion of the time that the tariff was responsible for the panic. On the contrary, a congressional committee reporting on the subject of the tariff in 1858, offered a series of resolutions—with only two dissenting votes—in favor of extending the operation of the Walker tariff and abandoning the protective policy entirely. The third resolution of the series was an out spoken affirmation of the doctrine of free trade. It was as follows:

Resolved, That the highest development of the industrial resources of the country is to be attained by the greatest freedom of exchanges, which can only be thoroughly accomplished by the entire abolition of the duties on imports and a resort to direct taxation.

There was another resolution in the series, which has a distinct bearing on Mr. Blaine's subsidy views set forth in the paper already referred to. It was a resolution for free ships, in these words:

Resolved, That the navigation laws should be so modified as not to require any portion of the officers and crews of American ships to be American citizens and that American citizens shall be free to purchase and sail foreign-built ships on an equality with American built ships, and that the American coasting trade shall be open on terms of entire equality to foreign ships.

Whatever else may be said of these resolutions, they conclusively negative the idea—adopted as they were on the very heels of the panic of 1857—that the panic was believed to be due to the free trade tariff. Nor is it true, as Mr. Blaine intimates, that the "burdens" imposed by this panic were removed by a protective tariff. The Morrill tariff was enacted purely as a war measure and had no reference whatever to the removal of any burdens assumed to have been left by the crash of 1857. It may not be amiss to remind our readers, in conclusion, that the most disastrous periods of business or industrial depression ever known in our history have occurred under this same Morrill tariff and the modifications which have been made in it at the behests of the cormorants.—Free Press.

A Cure for Diphtheria.

The following remedy is said to be the best known, at least it is worth trying, for physicians seem powerless to cope with the disease successfully. At the first indication of diphtheria in the throat of a child make the room close; then take a tin cup and pour into it a quantity of tar and turpentine, equal parts. Then hold the cup over a fire so as to fill the room with fumes. The little patient, on inhaling the fumes, will cough up and spit out all the membranous matter, and the diphtheria will pass off. The fumes of the tar and turpentine loosen the matter in the throat, and thus afford the relief that has baffled the skill of physicians.—Scientific American.

The schoolmaster of the republic,—so Noah Webster has been called, and two or three generations have grown up under his training from Webster's Spelling Book, to Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, in his mature and professional life. This latter has been rebuilt and added to till it is like a great University, comprising not only a complete "regular course" of Lexicography but also full "special departments," as, for example, a Biographical Dictionary of nearly 10,000 names, a New Gazetteer of the World with 25,000 titles embracing valuable information in condensed form under each title, and a variety of other useful helps to knowledge in its elaborate tables. Its latest addition, a Gazetteer, must be of great use to the many who do not possess the more bulky and expensive Gazetteers. What more can we ask in a dictionary than we now have in Webster's Unabridged?

The Largest Book Published.

The latest edition of Webster's Unabridged, in the quantity of matter it contains, is believed to be the largest volume published. It will surprise many to know that by printers' careful reckoning it contains eight times the amount of matter that is in the Bible, being sufficient to make 75 12 mo. volumes such as usually sell for $1.25 each. But the best thing about the book is that no space is wasted. It is crammed with useful knowledge for every person who has learned to read.

Merit Wins.

We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great popularity purely on their merits. F. G. Hines & Co., Druggists.

A. A. Shaver, republican ex-treasurer of Clare county, has acknowledged that he and A. E. Mack, ex-county clerk, defrauded the county of $1,000 eight years ago, and used the money for campaign purposes, securing their own re-election, and others on their ticket. One by one the rascals come to grief. Let us hope that others may be forced to a similar acknowledgment of their peculations.

Let us have the report of the U. S. Senate Cattle Commission. The people are anxious to know why the kings who control the cattle trade would not appear before this commission when asked to do so; and the people would like to know why it is that cattle are so cheap, and the beef they make is sold by the retailers so high? There is robbery at both ends of the line, and monopoly from end to end.—Farm Journal.

A state prohibition conference is to be held in Philharmonic hall, Detroit, commencing at 9 a. m., Feb. 11. Papers are to be read by the following well known prohibitionists: Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop, M. J. Fanning, Prof. Samuel Dickie, Rev. John Russell and Richard F. Trevelick. The gathering will end with a platform meeting in the evening to be addressed by Hon. Ex-Gov. John P. St. John, of Kansas, and others. A large attendance of prohibition party people from all parts of the state is expected.

In Chicago last week the death rate was so unusually large that there were not hearses enough to properly carry the dead to the graveyards, and eight bodies were taken to cemeteries in carriages in one day. There were 497 deaths reported during the week ending Sunday, mostly from throat and lung diseases. The Herald estimates that fully ten per cent were due directly to the grip. In New York the situation is even worse. The average death rate is upwards of 200 per day, and last Thursday it reached 250.

SHEEP AND THEIR FLEECES

HOW PROTECTED WOOL RESTRICTS THE MANUFACTURER.

No Carpet Wool Is Grown in the United States—Manufacturers Must Always Have Australian Wool to Make Fine Dress Goods—How Protection Cuts Both Ways.

Wool is a staple of infinite variety. No two sheep, even of the same breed and pasturing on the same grass land, will yield fleeces that will bring exactly the same price.

So with breeds of sheep and their natural pasturage. A hundred sheep are transported from Saxony to Yorkshire, England. In a few years' time the fine merino wool of the Saxon sheep will either be considerably coarser in quality or lighter in weight.

Experience in sheep breeding has taught the wool growers of the world that certain localities are best suited for certain breeds of sheep. It does not follow that any of these breeds should be of a previously known variety. The great flocks of Australia are the result of many crosses between the different varieties of English and Saxony sheep.

The locality of the sheep run has much to do with the value of the fleece. In England, where the pasture is like a garden lawn and where the shepherd has not too many sheep to attend to, the fleece is comparatively free from dirt or artificial impurities. On the other hand, fleeces coming from the Argentine Republic are noted for the number of burrs knotted in them. This makes a serious difference in the price paid for the wool.

Sheep were first brought to the United States in 1609. Exactly 200 years afterward the first important consignment of merino sheep arrived here. It numbered 4,000. Since then the merino and English strains have been blended in all the flocks in this country.

In some respects the climate of the eastern half of the United States is unfitted for rearing sheep in greatest perfection. The extremes of heat and cold are too great. In moist, equable climates sheep never drink water, but quench their thirst with succulent grass.

Lambs are shorn for the first time when they are eight months old. This shearing is called the "first clip," and commands a higher price relatively than any subsequent. The weight of a first clip fleece is not usually more than three pounds, and often less than this weight.

England seems to be the only densely populated country in the world where sheep farming is carried on successfully. The great sheep runs of Australia have only their owners and shepherds near them. So also in the Argentine Republic, and in Texas the inhabitants near sheep pastures are much fewer than in older parts of these countries.

To some extent sheep raising appears to have been almost a pioneer exploit in this country. In 1868 there were 38,000,000 sheep east of the Mississippi river. In 1888 the number was reduced to 13,000,000. Even these 13,000,000 do not show a fair average, for an undue proportion of them are in the twenty-eight counties of Ohio which form a natural sheep pasture.

For one reason or other, other states between the Atlantic and the Mississippi river have given up largely the raising of sheep. In the prosperous farming state of Iowa dairy farming has been found more profitable. Illinois raises dairy products, too, as well as corn and wheat on former sheep pasture lands. At the present time the great wool growing states, excepting Ohio, are in order as follows: California, Texas, New Mexico territory and Oregon. Three of these are practically frontier states; the fourth, California, in its climate resembles Australia.

According to the report of the agricultural department the total number of sheep in the United States in 1888 was 45,544,755. These yielded a total wool clip of 301,676,121 pounds. The total quantity of unmanufactured wool imported into this country in 1887 was 114,404,173 pounds. Of this quantity about 81,000,000 pounds were for the manufacture of carpets.

Under the tariff of 1883 imported wools are divided into three classes. These are combing wools, clothing wools and carpet wools. The first two classes are subject to a duty of ten cents a pound if thirty cents or less in value. If they are more than thirty cents a pound in value the duty is twelve cents a pound. Carpet wools pay a duty of two and a half cents a pound if the value is twelve cents or less a pound, and five cents a pound if the value is more than twelve cents. These duties represent respectively ad valorem 43.23, 34.78 and 24.98 per cent.

It is quite apparent, therefore, that the farmer in this country is abundantly protected—so much so, in fact, that practically no wool is exported out of the country.

On the other hand, it would not follow, if wool was protected more highly than at present that the imports of foreign wool would be lessened.

All the wools produced in the United States are of medium grades. It is neither the very best nor the worst. The sheep which produce carpet wools have fleeces which average two and a half to three pounds each. This does not begin to pay the American farmer who raises sheep for the fleece alone, and so that every pound of carpet wool is imported. This does away with the 81,000,000 pounds of imported carpet wool referred to above.

Again, the American manufacturer cannot make fine dress goods for ladies' wear from American grown wool. He has to pack his trunk and go to London to the great Australian wool sales. There he buys all the fine wool he requires like any unprotected English competitor. When his fine wool arrives at New York he is glad to shell out 54 per cent. ad valorem duty on it, all for the sacred cause of protection!

If foreign wool was admitted free of duty the farmer could not lose anything on carpet wools, because he does not produce them. He would lose something over the free importation of fine wools, because some of his wools are now used for this purpose.

But as soon as the American manufacturers had an unrestricted entrance to the London market the price of the world's wool clip would go up like a rocket. The American flock master, like the American wheat grower, would become an exporter. His heavy, medium grade fleeces would bring him higher prices in the world market than they do in Philadelphia now. Not only that, but he could turn his attention to improving his breed of sheep so as to suit the climate and soil on which they are reared, instead of trying to get merino wool off mountain sheep.

THE BRITISH COBDEN CLUB.

Some Prominent Americans Who Belonged to It.

A favorite argument of the high tariff "spell binders" during the last presidential campaign was that the Cobden club of London was expending vast sums of money in order to win the election for Mr. Cleveland, who was in favor of a reduction in the present outrageous tariff.

Although the accusation afterward turned out to be a wonderful example of those who live in glass houses throwing stones, yet many people in this country have not a very clear idea of what the Cobden club is and what are its objects. The Cobden club was founded in London in 1866, the year after Richard Cobden's death. Its object was to perpetuate the memory of the man whose name it bore by propagating his economic theories. Its motto is, "Free trade, peace and good will among the nations."

Every year the club publishes some work in furtherance of these principles. It also awards medals for the best essays on any subject connected with political economy to the students of various leading colleges throughout the world, including Yale and Harvard in this country.

Once a year the members who may happen to be in London at the date fixed dine together, and the expenses of this dinner are paid out of the club funds. With the exception of the year 1881, the annual income of the club has never exceeded $15,000. In that year a special fund of $8,860 was contributed to defray the cost of publishing a special series of works on "Systems of Land Tenure." The disturbed relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland at that time called for that effort.

As the membership of the Cobden club is almost entirely confined to the classes dubbed by high tariff orators in this country "old fogies" and "college theorists," it is not likely that much money would come from that quarter. The late James A. Garfield, the late Charles Sumner, the late E. P. Whipple and the late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher were members of the Cobden club. At present its roll bears the names of George Bancroft, Edward Atkinson and Hugh McCulloch.

John G. Carlisle on the American Farmer.

The American farmer, although he cultivates the most fertile soil in the world, and ought to be the most prosperous member of the community, is constantly engaged in a hard struggle to secure a comfortable support for his family and a moderate education for his children, and to pay his taxes and keep out of debt. This is all he can reasonably hope to accomplish; in a large majority of cases he falls even to do this, and, sooner or later, is compelled to mortgage his land and raise his expenditures to the lowest possible figure.

He has a paternal government which has determined that certain classes of industry ought to be maintained at the public expense, and for fifty years he has been taxed for their support; and now after these industries have become rich and powerful, they combine and confederate under the names of trusts, syndicates and pools, and dictate to us terms upon which the people may procure the necessities of life and carry on their business.—John G. Carlisle in January Forum.

Woolen Statistics.

During the year 1888 fifty-seven wool dealers and woolen manufacturers failed, with liabilities amounting to $5,637,000 and assets amounting to $1,976,000. This was pretty good from a high protection point of view, as many of the failures were doubtless due to the fear of Mr. Cleveland's re-election.

Unfortunately, during the year 1889, seventy-two wool dealers and woolen manufacturers failed, with liabilities amounting to $10,142,000 and assets amounting to $7,622,000.

The failures in 1889 will, of course, be ascribed to the mild winter. But Engl land had also a mild winter, and the prosperity of her woolen and worsted mills has not been so great in ten years. Secretary Windom also has increased the tariff on worsteds, so that no fault can be found on that score. A plausible suggestion for the improvement of the woolen situation would be less protection and more brains. The opposite plan has had a fair trial now.

Robberies Near Paris.

There have been so many robberies of late in the suburbs of Paris that the police have unearthed an old "ordonnance" which enjoins the inhabitants of the Banlieue, as it is called, to close the doors of their houses and the gates of their courtyards by a certain hour in the evening. This, at first sight, appears to be rather an odd proceeding, as the suburban residents might have been expected under the circumstances to require no hint of this kind. The police, however, seem to have some particular houses in their eye, as they have learned by experience that several of the burglars whom they have pursued have found their way into certain domiciles, the doors of which had been left conveniently open, as if to offer them a refuge. In future, according to the "circular" issued, only public establishments where closing is regulated by special ordinance will be permitted to keep their doors open after 9 o'clock in the winter months.—Paris Cor. London Telegraph.

TARIFF HEARINGS.

THE WAILINGS OF TINNED PLATE AND ANVIL MEN.

Statistics from Mr. William C. Cronemeyer—He Would Take a Population Nearly as Large as New York to Do as Much as 11,000 Welshmen.

The scene is the committee room of the ways and means committee. The time is Dec. 27. Enter Mr. William C. Cronemeyer, of Pittsburg. He states his views to the committee on ways and means. The desire of his soul is to see the United States manufacture their own tinned plate. The cost of manufacturing tinned plate in this country, according to Mr. Cronemeyer, would be $5.50 per box of 112 pounds. In England the same quantity could be delivered free on board ship at Liverpool at $3.25. Mr. Cronemeyer modestly stated that he wanted only enough protection to equalize the difference in the cost of labor between the two countries. "If the tinned plate industry," concluded Mr. Cronemeyer, "could be built up in this country, it would support a number of people nearly equal to the population of New York city."

Accepting Mr. Cronemeyer's figures as correct, the following facts are also pertinent to the matter. Nearly half the cost of tinned plate is for sheet steel which makes up 95 per cent. of finished tinned plate. At no time has the cost of a sheet of steel of the same size and weight been less than four cents in this country. This amount is for the raw material alone. A finished sheet of tinned plate of the same size is paid for on board at Liverpool for three cents. The duty is one cent a pound. As each sheet weighs a pound, the cost of a sheet of tinned plate landed in this country is, therefore, four cents. But Mr. Cronemeyer proposes to manufacture tinned plate in this country with a protective tariff of two cents a pound. Therefore, for one cent a pound he proposes to pay the cost of tin, sulphuric acid, palm oil and wages; or, in other words, he proposes to do the whole process of tinning steel plates at a less cost than the Welsh do it at present.

Mr. Cronemeyer's next point is even more delicious. He says that an industry might be built up giving employment to a number of people nearly equal to the population of New York city. From the report of Consul Jones on the "Tin Plate Trade of South Wales" it may easily be deduced that the total number of men engaged in the tinned plate industry does not exceed 44,000. According to the same report the average annual product of these is 20,736,000 boxes. Of these we import about one-fourth. Query: If 11,000 Welshmen are able to supply the tinned plate trade of the United States at an average rate of wages of $2.50 per week, what will it cost to employ a population nearly equal to New York city at double that rate of wages, and how many sheets for tinned plates will each employe make in five years?

In proposing to double the tariff on tinned plate, Mr. Cronemeyer will have to take account with several powerful industries. Almost every utensil used in dairy farming is made from tinned plate, including the tin cans used for condensed milk, not less than $7,000,000 worth of tinned plate is used annually in this country for dairy purposes. This amount is exclusive of a tariff of 35 per cent.

The condensed milk industry is not only a large domestic industry, but a few years ago the Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk company established factories in Illinois for the purpose of exporting their condensed milk. The extra cent a pound on tinned plate will drive them back to Switzerland again.

At present a dairyman pays four cents duty on each ten-quart can, eight cents duty on each twenty-quart can and forty-five cents on each forty-quart can. Under the proposed advance in the tariff on tinned plates, these rates will be doubled. Ninety cents duty on every forty-quart can!

Even of greater importance is the canned goods industry. Last year $10,000,000 of tinned plate, exclusive of duty, was consumed in this industry. Not less than 600,000,000 cans are made each year for holding preserved fish, meats, fruit and vegetables. An ordinary tomato can, even though thrown away as empty and gold for nothing, represents a duty of one half cent as paid to the national treasury for the tinned plate of which it is made, another cent a pound will stop exports in this industry.

The last industry which uses tinned plate will not be much affected by an advance in the tariff. This is the Standard Oil trust, which uses 2,500,000 pounds a year of tinned plate for cans in which to export its oil. As the trust does its business in large fashion, it can afford to take advantage of the rebate which the government offers to exporters. Would it not be a good plan for the government to give a rebate of one-half cent for every empty tomato can presented to it? The people of the United States should not be any worse off in this respect than foreigners who use our exported oil.

Mr. Clark Fisher, of Trenton, N. J., is anxious about anvils. He described them to the ways and means committee as the oldest implement known to mankind. Mr. Fisher said that forty years ago there were twenty-five firms making anvils, and there were only five. A duty of 2 3-10 cents per pound would satisfy Mr. Fisher. It would enable the manufacturers to turn out anvils cheaper on account of the greater production. So far Mr. Fisher.

The present tariff on anvils is 2 cents per pound. In the last senate bill this amount was left unchanged.

But what a beautiful trust the three surviving anvil firms would make to reduce prices with an increased duty of 2 3-10 cents per pound!

North Carolina has 800,000 acres of swamp land to sell for the benefit of her educational fund.

"In Charlevoix the people are so honest that they put an advertisement in the papers when they find a stray umbrella in their hat rack. Now over here the deacons, elders, (tall we fear the preachers) see too moral turpitude in hooking on to any umbrella they see on a rainy day. That's the reason the Record umbrellas all have the words 'Record office' printed in bold letters on the outside, to be seen of all the world when spread in public.—Petoskey Record.

On Wednesday evening while Mrs. Aldrich was at church, Ernest Aldrich became very much frightened at some noise in the house, which he believed to be a strange person, and either dropped or threw a lamp and ran to Cochran's drug store and asked Fred Cochran to come and see what or who it was. On going to the house Fred found that the lamp had broken and the oil had ignited and burned a large hole in the carpet. A rocking chair was all ablaze. He tore the chair out doors, and gathered up a lot of snow and threw on the burning carpet, extinguishing the blaze. Little Anna Aldrich was asleep in an adjoining room, and did not awaken during all the excitement and noise. If for any cause there had been a delay of two or three minutes, the fire would have got an ugly start, and little Anna would very likely have suffocated by the smoke. It was a narrow escape.

A House for the Sexton.

Our attention has been called to the need of some sort of protection from storms for the sexton at the cemetery while waiting funeral ceremonies. Last summer he secured quite a long list of names to a petition in favor of a small house, but so far the trustees have not furnished it. Whatever may be our hope or expectation for a light mortality, deaths do occur, and funerals must be held in all sorts of weather, and it seems only proper that the sexton should have some protection from the storm while waiting.

On this subject, Mr. Harsha, township clerk, says the trustees prefer to have the question decided at the annual town meeting, particularly the amount to be so expended.

The most severe weather is yet to come, but the sexton will have to stand it all if nothing is done before the next town meeting.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

The JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns in which it is not represented. Short, pithy, newsy items in brief and concise form are desired. Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach this office by the Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features of correspondence are regularity and punctuality.

Ironton.

Jan. 14—And now we are having some winter weather. Pine lake froze over last night as far as can be seen, and everything begins to look lively again.

The farmers are rushing the logs to the mill, and the company keep keeping their men and teams busy hauling wood into their yards.

John Myers purchased 100 acres of land last week of the iron company, and intends getting out logs, ties and posts for parties at East Jordan.

The school in Mountain district closed Friday after a very successful term. This was Miss Johnson's first attempt at teaching, and she has showed their appreciation of her services by presenting her with a handsome sewing chair.

The Ironton teachers have changed their boarding place since vacation. They are now with Mr. and Mrs. Purvis.

Mr. Box had the misfortune to lose a valuable 3-year-old colt one night last week.

No services Sunday morning on account of illness of the pastor, who has the sore throat disease that is going the rounds. Mr. Parker and family are also down with it. W. Henry is also on the sick list.

Mr. Wm. Shaw has purchased the old Sanborn house and lot in Ironton and is fitting up the house for a nice little home.

The County Poor House.

The late H. B. Chapman's white elephant, the magnificent Bay Springs Hotel, has found its mission at last. The superintendents of the poor have approved of it as a home for the county poor, and it only needs the confirmation of the board of supervisors to complete the transaction. This splendid building has every requirement of a modern resort hotel, and cost $20,000 to build. It is now offered to the county for the sum of $4,800, which price includes 100 acres of land in the rear. There are about 60 acres of the land cleared and seeded down, it is good soil, and as near flat as possible. It will be necessary to expend about $1,200 for furniture, stock and implements, and although this seems a large outlay, yet it will prove great economy in the end. There are now at least twenty permanent poor on the hands of the county, costing something like a total of $50 per week to board and clothe. Most of these will be able to earn as much if not more than they cost by working on the farm, and in the long run the county will be the gainer.—Enterprise.

FREE IRON ORE.

HAT'S WHAT MAJ. BENT DESIRES TO HAVE.

he President of the Largest Steel Works In America Thinks the Time Ripe for Less Protection on Raw Materials. What Free Ore Would Do for America.

Maj. L. S. Bent is president of the great Pennsylvania Steel company, of Steelton, Pa. He has had the control and actual management of this company for many years. He understands thoroughly the practical details of iron and steel founding.

The Pennsylvania Steel company has been so successful in its present location that it has had to choose between not enlarging its present plant at Steelton or building new works. It has chosen the latter course, and new works are in course of building at Sparrow Point, Md., which will be capable of using over 1,000,000 tons of Bessemer steel ore every year.

Maj. Bent is outspoken in his demand for free ore. In an interview with a Philadelphia Record reporter, which is given below, the major explains the benefits of free raw materials:

"Yes, sir," continued Maj. Bent, "I mean exactly what I say. In our business, for which it is supposed a protective tariff is most especially devised, the demand for free raw material must be met, and we are quite prepared for all the reduction in tariff duties on manufactured products that an accession to this demand logically carries with it. For the first time within the experience of those now engaged in the iron and steel business this country is thrown entirely upon its own resources of production to supply the demand for these articles. This new and entirely unexpected condition of affairs has been suddenly thrust upon the country after a long depression of those industries. One of the principal causes which have brought about this condition of affairs is the state of the business in Europe; not only have prices of iron and steel there advanced to a point where exportation to this country is prohibited, but they have come upabreast of, and in some specialties have advanced beyond, those ruling on this side of the water. To show that these prices are not speculative, here is a late market report from London: 'Steel rails—No further change to prices, but demand active and market strong; heavy sections quoted at £6 10s., equal to $33, free on board, shipping points. Bessemer pig—Large business done; prices still further advanced and firmly at 77s., equal to $19.25, free on board. These are American prices.' This is an anomalous condition of affairs, and though it presumably cannot long continue, that it has actually occurred is one of the striking events of the time. The causes which have contributed to these rapid advances—if we may except a limited factor of speculation—in my opinion are there to stay. They are, first, the scarcity of material, such as fuel and ore; these are approaching exhaustion in England, and there is a continued increase in the cost of mining. Scarcity, manufacturers abroad have to meet the labor problem; wages there are no distant day are destined to equal wages here."

"What would be the result of equalizing the wages?"

"I believe that we would have an advantage, because of the greater productive power of American labor. There can be no doubt that this exists. There is a radical difference between the character of the American and of the foreign workingman. A 10 per cent. advance in wages in our industrial establishments means, as a rule, 10 per cent. of saving, which is made in itself productive by the employe, and an increased effort on his part to get in more hours and produce more tons, thereby increasing and saving to himself, as well as to his employer.

"Why do you think the present high prices are likely to continue?"

"If you ask a manufacturer for his product for future delivery, while he will name a price quite within the limit, he will likely add that he has none to sell. The person who is now in most demand is the one who has something to sell, and this is at the very beginning of the upward movement. The surplus resources which were hanging heavily on our hands three months ago are already nearly consumed. The unlimited supply of raw materials, of which we never tire boasting, is in the hills and mountains. The furnaces that are to put it into merchantable shape are unbuilt. The transportation lines of the country are completely overwhelmed with business. There are scarcely sufficient motive power and transportation facilities to take care of the present business. There are thousands of tons of fuel for manufacturers lying at the mines and ovens for the want of cars to take them to idle furnaces. True it is that some small and badly located establishments have gone out; but they have gone out forever because of changed conditions, and because of the irreversible tendency towards the consolidation of productive industries in large establishments. The advance of today has not been so marked or rapid, and the prices have not gone so high, as in 1879; but in that year the rise of prices began in the United States and was followed somewhat later by an advance abroad, based entirely on the American markets. Our market held prices up, and when it broke the whole came down with a crash; but now the conditions are reversed. This country cannot be flooded with foreign manufactures. With this prospect for a large business opening to our furnaces and mines, with advancing prices reaching far into the future, is it the madness of a mad people to really 'protect' American industries by relieving their raw material of the burdens now laid upon it?

"How would you apply this to your own business?"

"I do not want to be understood as speaking from a purely selfish standpoint. Whether or not a protective tariff has built up such industries as mine is not so much of a practical question as what is the proper policy to be pursued in the present and for the future. It is literally 'a condition, not a theory, which confronts us.' When the great works at Sparrow Point shall be in full operation, the Pennsylvania Steel company must import 1,000,000 tons of Bessemer ore per annum. To restrict us to the home supply is utterly impracticable; there are no ores to be had at home such as are needed for our purposes. We would have to go thousands of miles into the interior for them. To raise the duties on this ore to such a point as to 'protect' the American mines and miners from Cuban and Mediterranean Bessemer ores would simply be to close all our works, put out our furnaces, throw tens of thousands of workingmen out of employment, and render unproductive tens of millions of capital. Even at the present rate of duty we have to pay $700,000 per year tariff tax. This must either come off the wages of American workingmen or off the profits of American manufacturers. This means $1.50 impost on every ton of our product, and a handicap of that amount upon us in our competition with foreign manufacturers for whatever distance that dollar and a half would carry our products into the world's market further than they now go. My theory is that if the government should remove the present duty on ore, it would be vastly conducive to the building up of industrial establishments on the seaboard. The iron manufacturers of the west can find their market in the west. They will have, as they ought to have, the advantage of home ores at their own door; and these will always have the advantage of railroad transportation over foreign ores admitted free of duty."

SOME NEW VIEWS ON THE TARIFF.

By Senator Sherman in the Forty-Seventh Congress.

Senators on the other side may think from the vote—I can almost refer to it as a party vote—that they can make political capital by reducing the tax on tobacco. I do not believe it. I believe the plain people of this country, as Mr. Lincoln called them, see through it. They are willing to pay the tax on tobacco, on whisky and on beer. They are the only internal taxes they are willing to pay, and are willing to let these three taxes stand as they are until we can gradually reduce them as the condition of their revenue may allow.

Strip your internal revenue of all other clauses even if it to do so does benefit some of the banks even if it does keep on taxes that might be kept on a little while longer with no very great injury; yet it confines the system to those three articles, which in every country are the subjects of taxation. Then spread the balance of your reduction on the extreme of your duties, and do what little good you can until the tariff commission enables us to reduce the whole system of external taxes.

Why He Voted for Campbell and Free Wool.

During the recent campaign in Ohio, one of the largest flockmasters in that state produced something like consternation by announcing that he meant to vote for "Campbell and Free Wool." His high tariff friends remonstrated with him in vain. Then they asked him what were his reasons for deserting the high tariff party at such a time.

"Wal," he replied, "I have been thinking over this matter for a long time. Last presidential election I almost lost my sheep by the tariff question. I do not screw up my courage at the last moment. But I'm mave I read and think about the subject the more I am convinced that it would be money in every wool grower's pocket to have free wool.

"At present," he continued, "no country in the world which manufactures woolen goods raises enough of the raw staple to supply its own manufacturers. So the Germany, France, Germany and the United States have all to buy a greater or less quantity of wool raised in Australia or the Argentine Republic.

"Now, the effect of removing the duty on wool imported into this country would be, in the first place, to send the buyers of our woolen mills to the London market. Once there, the competition of a new set of buyers would force up the price of wool in the European markets to its present level in this country. Not only that, but these high prices would be maintained.

"We should begin to pool our wools along with the other wool growing countries of the world. At present, unsuitable wools are used in our domestic manufactures on account of the high price of imported wools. Under a free wool scheme we would sell these wools to other countries which needed them for the purposes for which they were best fitted. In return, we would buy wools which would enable us to compete with the English and French cloth makers in the markets of the world."

A Good Substitute for an Overcoat.

Gen. Bussey, the assistant secretary of the interior, has a somewhat novel use for newspapers. The other day when the weather was sharp he was preparing to go out of the department building for lunch. A Washington Star reporter who happened to be in the room at the time was surprised to see him unbutton the lower buttons on his vest, fold up a newspaper and, placing it over his abdomen, button the vest over it. "I always do that," he said in reply to a surprised inquiry from the reporter, "when I am going to be out in the cold. The newspaper is a non-conductor of heat, and when placed over the stomach preserves the supply in what has been called the reservoir of heat of the body. A newspaper is a good substitute for an overcoat, and in cold weather is the best device that people with scanty wardrobes can adopt. In sufficient bedclothing can be reinforced in the same way, and the newspaper may be said to be the poor man's friend in more sense than one. When chilled by sudden cold a newspaper placed over the stomach soon restores the normal temperature of the body and prevents an attack of pneumonia. I have frequently recommended this use of newspapers, and I find that practically very few people really appreciate its value."

The schoolmaster of the republic,—so Noah Webster has been called; and two or three generations have grown up under his training from Webster's Spelling Book, to Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, in business and professional life. This latter has been rebuilt and added to till it is like a great University, comprising not only a complete "regular course" in lexicography but also full "special departments;" as, for example, a Biographical Dictionary of nearly 10,000 names, a New Gazetteer of the World with 25,000 titles embracing valuable information in condensed form under each title, and a variety of other useful matter not found in the elaborate tables. Its latest addition, the Gazetteer, must be of great use to the many who do not possess the more bulky and expensive Gazetteers. What more can we ask in a dictionary than we now have in Webster's Unabridged?

The Largest Book Published.

The latest edition of Webster's Unabridged, in the quantity of matter it contains, is believed to be the largest volume published. It will surprise many to know that by printers' careful reckoning it contains eight times the amount of matter that is in the Bible, being sufficient to make 75 12 mo. volumes such as usually sell for $1.25 each. But the best thing about the book is that no space is wasted. It is crammed with useful knowledge for every person who has learned to read.

Remarkable Rescue.

Mrs. Michael Curtain, Plainfield, Ill., makes the statement that she caught cold, which settled on her lungs; she was treated for a month by her family physician, but grew worse. He told her she was a hopeless victim of consumption and that no medicine could cure her. Her druggist suggested Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption; she bought a bottle and to her delight found herself benefited from first dose. She continued its use and after taking ten bottles, found herself sound and well, now able to do her own housework and is as well as she ever was. —Free trial bottles of this great Discovery at F. G. Mixer & Co.'s drug store, large bottles 50c. and $1.00.

PRINTERS' INK.

A JOURNAL FOR ADVERTISERS.

PRINTERS' INK is just what it purports to be, "a journal for advertisers." It is published at fifteen and fifteen days of each month, and is the representative journal of its class, and is equal—of American advertisers. It tells the business men how to advertise to the best, most profitable advantage, when, where, and where to advertise; how to write an advertisement; how to display one; what newspapers or other media to use; how much to expend—in fact, discusses in every point and status of profitable advertising. If you advertise at all, PRINTERS' INK can help you. Perhaps you expend a little or much money in advertising; if so, PRINTERS' INK may show you how to double results or service you use now getting the value of your money. A year's subscription costs but two dollars; a sample copy costs but Five Cents. Advertising is as much a science as any other thing contemplated becoming so. "A Year in the Country," by Josiphine Pollard, "Chatty Letters" (Jennie Wren), which will treat of the various duties for each month, "A Chat Over Fashions," by Mme. Demorest.

A rich array of literature by favorite authors, among others are Emily Lennox, Olivia Lovell Wilson, Ada Marie Peck, Elsie Stacy, "M.," author of "Gladys," Belle C. Greene, with her humorous sketches, and others.

PREMIUMS to Club Raisers are offered of great value, and are given for only the small price of a subscriber of any magazine published. Send 15c. for sample number containing full club rates and premiums.

A Daily Paper FOR 1 Cent a Day.

A daily newspaper now costs but little more than the old-time weekly. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an impartial, independent newspaper. It is a member of the Associated Press. It prints all the news and sells it for 1 cent a day. Mailed, postpaid, for $3.00 per year, or 25 cents per month. This is $3.00 per year less than the price of any other Chicago morning paper. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is not a blanket-sheet. It is a condensed paper. You can read it and still have time left for an honest day's work. It is a daily paper for busy people. Every one who has the advantage of a daily mail service need longer be content with a weekly newspaper. The circulation of the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is, with a single exception, the largest in the United States—it exceeds that of all other Chicago dailies combined. You ought to read a daily paper. Why not try the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS?

BEWARE OF THE BOOMER.

A Michigan Man's Experience in the Seattle Region.

Detroit Evening News.

"They are entirely welcome to their wild and woolly west, but Michigan is good enough for me hereafter," said Owen Comerford, formerly of Cheboygan, as he alighted from a Michigan Central train last evening with his wife and worldly possessions.

"I left Cheboygan just a year and a half ago tonight, and I think my experience, although it cost me dearly, will be of benefit to others," continued the gentleman. "I had a wild yearning to go out there, and I suppose that had I remained in Michigan that yearning would be clinging to me still. But I went and have been thoroughly renovated and fumigated as it were. When I left I had quite a little bundle of money and several companions from this state. We went out to speculate in anything we could see any money in. We tried Seattle, Tacoma, Portland and all the towns that are being boomed. The investment that we longed for we never found, and when I fully realized that we were victims of the boomers and general land sharks, I invested my money in a business in one of the best locations in Portland. It was no use, though. We reached the limit, and when another deluded individual came along and made me an offer, I accepted it so promptly that he must have thought I had heart disease, and here I am."

"What was the experience of the other Michigan men went with you?"

"They are far worse off than I am, for I am back. One man in particular, whom I could mention, sold out a good business in Cheboygan, but I will stake everything I have left that he has not made five cents since he left; and if it costs him as much to live as it did me, he must be just about at the bottom of his pile."

"What is the cause of this?"

"It is simply this—that the country has been overdone—boomed to death. People go out there with a few hundred or a few thousand dollars, seeking profitable investment for it, and they find hundreds in the same boat. To make money then, you must start with a fortune. Of course, there are exceptions to this rule, and some men strike it rich; but the chances against a man doing it are about those you meet with in attempting to draw the capital prize in a lottery. They wait and watch and in time they find themselves so short of finances that the only recourse is to invest in transportation east or a graveyard for future use in the west.

"The cost of living is very high and that is where the drain comes in. I know of hundreds who would gladly return east if they had the wherewith to do so, and I tell you they get pretty desperate sometimes and give the railroad men a heap of trouble in sweeping them off the east-bound trains. We left Portland last Thursday night—just six days ago—but we were delayed 24 hours by snow. You can't imagine how good it feels to get back to Michigan."

"Who is it that is doing all the booming out there?"

"The land speculators do considerable, but the cities are the ones that do most of it. Why, the city council of Portland this year voted $30,000 for advertising purposes, the most of it to be invested in printed matter, descriptive of the glorious climate, and crops. I saw one car, completely filled with this stuff, on its way east, and the unsuspecting farmer will soon have the privilege of reading this flaming literature and experiencing an itching to sell off his property and go out there and get rich. I haven't read any of the new batch of circulars, but if they contain any reference to the expositions and exhibits of fruits and crops recently made in some of these cities, I want to tell that statement right here. I know whereof I speak, that nearly every thing exhibited there was brought from the east; not that they cannot raise pretty fair crops in certain sections of that country, but simply because they don't, and never have. There is such a mad rush for wealth in a minute that the idea of farming seems too ridiculous to be entertained."

"How is the climate?"

"Well, there is not much to complain of in this regard, unless it be the frequency of rains. Last winter in Portland was a grand one to those from the east. They never had any snow to amount to anything until this winter. There is a foot of it now on the level and splendid sleighing. And it is amusing to see how the people are enjoying it. Of course there were but few cutters in Oakland when the snow came, and the people were compelled, if they decided to take advantage of it, to improvise vehicles, and they are as odd as they are numerous. The majority of them are dry goods boxes on runners and everybody slides. The livery men charge $5 an hour for a turn out. Even the plumber wears a smile, for many water pipes have frozen up and burst. But here we are tired out and dirty and you must excuse us. Just say that I'm in love with Michigan and that those who are chilly in their affections for it had better thaw out immediately and let well enough alone."

Wide Awake for February.

The February Wide Awake opens with a good Persian ballad, "Abu Said," by Mary E. Bradley, followed by a stirring episode of western military life by Lieutenant Fremont, entitled "Snow-shoe Thompson." There is an inspiring story of Greek boy-life, showing the effect of keeping a good ideal before a young lad's eyes. G. Hamlen tells a bright instance of a young girl's presence of mind in her story of "The Frogsleigh Mikado," and Mrs. Fremont will interest all readers with her account of "Kit Carson," in the second of her "Will and Way Stories." Grant Allen concludes his serial, "Wednesday the Tenth," in triumph; Mr. Stoddard in his serial of "A Rough Boy" is proving that young Gid Granger is "no slouch." The Norse serial by Boyesen comes to a close with the escape of the "Viking's sons" from the grip of a real bear. Miss McLeod's second Acadian story is finished. One of the very best of John Brownjohn's stories is given in the School Series, "The Wicked Waterbury Clock." Mrs. White gives artistic girls a good business hint in her article on Dressmaking in the "Business Openings" series. Mrs. Claflin's Margaret-Patty letter is full of subtle social wisdom. Alexander Black's "Confessions of an Amateur Photographer" is piquant reading. "Men and Things" abounds with good original anecdotes and curious lore. The poems of the number are by Mrs. Whiton Stone, Mary E. Bradley, Mrs. M. E. Butts, Clinton Scollard and Martha Young; "A Sad Case," one of the best of the long poems, is very amusing in text and pictures by Gordon Browne, the popular English artist. Wide Awake is $2.40 a year.

A Duel Between Intellectual Giants.

The January number of the North American Review will be rendered memorable by one of the most brilliant features which have ever appeared in an American periodical. This is a discussion between the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone and Hon. J. G. Blaine on the Tariff, Mr. Gladstone advocating free trade and Mr. Blaine protection. Whatever can be said on one side and the other of this subject will be said in these articles in the most telling and impressive way by these two great masters of controversy. Mr. Gladstone's article will occupy between twenty and thirty pages of the Review, and Mr. Blaine's reply will be about the same length, if not longer. It will be a battle of intellectual giants.

The articles will be published simultaneously, by Mr. Gladstone's consent, and, as they take up so much space, this issue of the Review will be enlarged to admit of the usual number and variety of papers on important and timely topics.

A man in business without an advertisement in a newspaper is like a grave without a tomb-stone, or a clock agent without a tongue. Neither one is known, neither one does much, all are passed by. Advertising is preaching the gospel of business to those who buy or ought to buy. Every business man may have a little trade, but unless he advertises the great body of traders will pass by the other side, and the fate of the business failures may come upon him.—Ex.

PHOTOGRAPHY AS A PASTIME.

The Possibilities for Pleasure and Instruction Which It Presents.

The wonderful growth of amateur photography as a popular outdoor pastime illustrates in a marked degree the elevating tendencies of the modern devices for health giving recreation. To the lover of those polite diversions that are devoid of the elements of daring adventure and the prowess of reckless exposure, the study of field photography presents attractions that are incomparably superior to those of other outdoor pastimes.

Photography enjoys an acknowledged supremacy over all other outdoor sports in that it cultivates the finer instincts and depends not for its fascinating features upon an exhibition of physical hardihood or athletic training. The pursuit of the pastime is beyond question ennobling and refining in its influence. It develops a keen and artistic eye for the beautiful in nature. Through the mystic and enchanting alchemy of the "dark room" it brings the receptive mind into contact with the great Artist who has filled the earth and sky with such regal beauty.

The whole realm of nature with its green fields and woodland symposium of daisies and buttercups, its babbling brooks, where the laughing rivulets go chattering with their silver beds over the stony depths and the nodding lilies drink in copious libations from the perpetual fount—all this is the kingdom of the amateur photographer.

The pastime is one that not only conduces to physical exhilaration, but, through the fascinating mystery of its results, it engages our admiration and enlists our ripest mental endeavor. Other outdoor sports are largely calculated for the development of the body without rendering to the mind any adequate recompense. Moreover, such pastimes as hunting, fishing, lawn tennis and base ball combine elements of roughness that are incompatible with the refined delicacy of the gentler sex. Photography is a recreation admirably adapted to both sexes.

After all, the excellence of the results accomplished are dependent upon the skill of the artist. The time of the exposure must be regulated according to the light and the character of the subject. To make indiscriminate "shots" at all sorts of objects is the pastime of the schoolboy and not of the artist. The most beautiful effects are obtained by a proper study of the lights and shadows of the landscape, coupled with a skillful exposure of such duration as is best calculated to draw out all the beauties of the scene. The dark foliage of trees will require a longer exposure than a house that has been painted white. And in this connection it is proper to remark that the most inane and insipid feature of the pastime is the photography of houses. No artist who is in love with the art will waste any of his precious negatives upon houses except, perchance, those that are singularly beautiful and rustic in their architectural conception.

Landscapes constitute the poetry of photography. They make up the rhythmic beauty of the photographic melody. A proper appreciation of the art is predicted upon the delicate impressionable nerves of the artist with reference to natural scenery.

The photography of faces that have been previously prepared to the touch should be left for the "professional" whose appreciation of the art is circumscribed by the limitations of the almighty dollar. It is his business to flatter human vanity for sordid lucre. The amateur must not prostitute the art to such base ends. If he desires to enshalm a sweet face or a graceful form on the unfading tablets of photography, he should "take" them by the instantaneous process, when they are not posing for it.

Groups of merrymakers, taken at a picnic or outing, without any warning from the operator, form a laughable feature of photography, and the pictures have the rare merit of being exceedingly "natural."

The time is coming when an educated man will not think of starting upon a pilgrimage without his trusty camera, upon whose never failing power he can depend to secure a panorama of his journey, which will be one of the comforts of his declining years. A glance at the pictures will revive a thousand tender associations of earlier days.

The time is also coming when every educated man who builds himself a home to live in, will give as much attention to the construction of the "dark room" as he does to the library. In the dark room, where may be developed at leisure the results of a day's tramp in field and forest, are to be found the true delights of photography. Here are evolved by the wand of the photographic wizard, the pictures that will hang on memory's wall for many years to come. After the day's battle and the ignoble strife for gain is ended, it is sweet to retire into the quiet seclusion of the enchanted dark room, and bring to light the hidden sun pencillings of a long ramble through the woods in the autumn days.

The dark room is an institution that will mollify the asperities of conubial life and dissipate the corroding perplexities of business care.—Forest and Stream.

The Deepest Lake Known.

By far the deepest lake known in the world is Lake Baikal, in Siberia, which in every way comparable to the great Canadian lakes as regards size; for, while its area of over 9,000 square miles makes it about equal to Erie in superficial extent, its enormous depth of between 4,000 and 4,500 feet makes the volume of its waters almost equal to that of Lake Superior. Although its surface is 1,850 feet above the sea level, its bottom is nearly 2,000 feet below it. The Caspian lake, or sea, as it is usually called, has a depth in its southern basin of over 3,000 feet. Lake Maggiore is 3,000 feet deep, Lake Como nearly 2,600 feet and Lago-di-Garda, another Italian lake, has a depth in certain places of 1,900 feet. Lake Constance is over 1,000 feet deep, and Huron and Michigan reach depths of 900 and 1,000 feet.—New York Telegram.

The schoolmaster of the republic,—so Noah Webster has been called; and two or three generations have grown up under his training from Webster's Spelling Book, to Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, in business and professional life. This latter has been rebuilt and added to till it is like a great University, comprising not only a complete "regular course" of Lexiography but also full "special departments;" as, for example, a Biographical Dictionary of nearly 10,000 names, a New Gazetteer of the World with 25,000 titles embracing valuable information in condensed form under each title, and a variety of other useful helps to knowledge in its elaborate tables. Its latest addition, the Gazetteer, must be of great use to the many who do not possess the more bulky and expensive Gazetteers. What more can we ask in a dictionary than we now have in Webster's Unabridged?

The rollers for the Rifenburg mill have been returned from the shop, and the mill is better than ever prepared to produce a high grade of flour. We know from experience that our flour in the market makes better bread than Iron Duke.

The Lamphear boys and Charles Lamoreaux are reported as saying that the article in another column headed "Beware of the Boomer," is true, every word of it,—in fact it does not tell all the truth about that country by considerable. Their advice is to stay in Michigan.

Concerning our club offer with the Weekly Free Press, a subscriber writes when renewing: "I regard your offer as one of the very best that I have seen for some time, and wish that every democrat in the county would take advantage of it." Only $1.90 for both papers one year (cash in advance).

The illustrations in the Chicago Herald cost $18,000 per year. The cleverest artists and the best engravers in America are employed. The Herald evidently believes that newspaper illustrations have come to stay, as it has a large investment in the machinery and appliances necessary to make its pictures.

The high school reading club will give a public entertainment at Barlbolomew's opera hall next Monday evening, Jan. 27th. The program contains seventeen numbers, and includes, readings, recitations, and music. An admission fee of 15 cents will be charged, the proceeds to be applied to fitting up the high school room with pictures, etc.

A recent issue of the Chicago Daily News has over a column in description of J. S. Smithson's missionary work with the Chinese in Chicago. Among other plans of work is a home or club, where they may meet for pleasure and instruction on week days and evenings, and for religious instruction on Sundays. An evening school for teaching the English language is part of the plan.

J. L. Hudson, of Detroit, one of the largest clothiers in America, uses an envelope on which is printed: "The business man who declares that he never made any money by advertising simply admits he never knew how to advertise." Mr. Hudson has used printers' ink to make himself a millionaire, and he has known how best to use it.

One of the best "annuals" we have seen this year is the Detroit Journal Year Book for 1890. It has all the features of an almanac, and a mass of information on everyday affairs not obtainable elsewhere in so convenient form. The book is given as a premium to the subscribers of the Detroit Journal, but is not for sale separately at any price.

A newspaper is a window through which men look out on all that is going on in the world. Without a newspaper a man is shut in a small room, and knows little or nothing of what is happening outside of himself. In our day the newspapers keep pace with history and record it. A newspaper will keep a man in sympathy with the world's current history. It is an unfolding encyclopedia and never finished. Always bear this in mind, and fail not to take, and more particularly pay for your home paper.—Ex

Vick's Floral Guide.

We have received from James Vick, Rochester N. Y., his Floral Guide, which in beauty of appearance and convenience of arrangement surpasses anything in this line which have ever had the privilege of seeing before. It is a pamphlet eight by ten in size, and with the covers which are by no means the least important part of it, contains an even one hundred pages. Although called a "floral guide," it is devoted to vegetables as well, and includes as full a list and description of both flowers, vegetables and also small fruits as could be brought within the compass of a book of this size.

Mrs. Capt. H. Vanderhoef Dies.

Petoskey Record.

The news brought over from Harbor Springs this morning that Mrs. Vanderhoef, wife of Capt. Vander hoef of the Friant, died last night of the influenza, caused great regret in Petoskey. Mrs. Vanderhoef had formed many acquaintances, and established not a few friendships on this side of the bay, and was very highly esteemed wherever she will know her. She was the light of her home, and the blow will fall with crushing force upon a husband who was devotedly attached to her, and on her children who worshiped her.

JAN. 21.—The weather, which is usually the introductory topic of conversation, correspondence, etc., is too disagreeably stormy and blustery this morning to deserve mention, so we will dispense with that item, and proceed to information more pleasant and valley-able.

Religious services were held in the schoolhouse Sunday, Rev. Mr. Burge officiating.

Silas Deming, who has been on the sick list, is convalescing, though not able to work yet.

Geo. E. Rogers of Advance visited at John A. Newville's on Sunday.

Grandma Newville and Mrs. Ann Newville visited at Capt. Haynes' on Saturday.

F. E. Miller of Eveline made farewell visits to his G. A. R. brethren and other friends in the valley, Sunday and Monday. He is about to move to Kansas City, Mo.

Wilson township board met Jan. 20th at the office of J. A. Newville, clerk, and extended the time for collecting taxes one month.

La grippe has been trying to get in its work, but still no serious results yet. Your correspondent has just heard that Capt. Haynes is sick; perhaps he is one of the victims.

JAN. 21—To-day we are having the biggest blizzard and the coldest weather that we have had so far this winter. No growling now about not having snow enough.

The W. C. T. U. held a silver medal contest last evening at the M. E. church. There were six contestants and all did remarkably well, but of course only one could win the medal, which was awarded to Emma Bird. This is the second contest that has been held.

The grippe has had numerous victims in this vicinity, but no very serious cases, and all are doing as well as could be expected. We have been lucky enough to have escaped its grip so far.

Mr. Thorp has taken a part interest in McGeagh's mill below Charlevoix and has moved his family to that place.

J. D. Parish has purchased a brand new pair of bob sleighs and now the logs will have to move out lively.

Burgess.

JAN. 22—Charley Howe has moved back to his farm in Hayes.

Chauncey Howe had a caller to stay until he is 21 at his place last Thursday.

Mrs. Hamlin was sick with the influenza last week; the first time she has been sick abed since moving to this country.

Owing to the sudden changes a good many are down with hard colds.

Most everyone are busy getting out logs.

Mr. White has moved into T. W. Dake's house for the winter.

HOW THEY MAKE SAILS.

TALK WITH A MAN WHO KNOWS ALL ABOUT THE BUSINESS.

Steam Has Almost Knocked Out the Sailmaker—How a Craft Is Fitted Out with a Complement of Sails—The Measuring, Sewing and Fitting.

"Steam, although it hasn't quite knocked out sailmaking, has pretty nearly given the quietus to a once important and money making business," said a well known Bay Ridge sailmaker. "As long as men use ships and boats so long will there be sails made, I suppose; but still, for all that, the trade isn't nearly what it used to be, when Atlantic packets and East Indiamen and Pacific coast ships used wind instead of that," and the speaker pointed to a huge ocean steamer which was crawling down the bay, emitting a huge black cloud from her double funnels.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

"Those were the times," he continued. "A suit of sails for a ship made a big hole in $2,000 or $3,000. No voyages were made without the sailmaker being called into requisition, and wages were high and profits large. But by degrees, as the steamship became the rival and then sailing ship the exception, trade grew less and less until at last it is practically confined to small craft, yachts and sailing boats. Of course there are some full rigged ships and barks left, but the sails for these are usually made by local makers at the places where the crafts are built. And as there is little or no big ship building in New York, why consequently there is no use for the sailmaker, at least to any extent."

"How do you manage to measure a craft for her sails?"

"We take the measurements of the stays or ropes which form the outside edge of the sails in some cases, and in others we measure the spars upon which they are bent or fastened. With the data and a knowledge of the required swell or 'belly' of the sail we calculate the dimensions. In the case of a mainsail or spanker, for example, we measure the gaff, boom and mast. Canvas comes in 'bolts' or rolls, each containing about forty yards. It is an easy matter from the figures alluded to to ascertain how much canvas will be required for the complete sail. The canvas is made of hemp, and is wonderfully strong. It varies in quality from the heaviest and toughest used for the big sails of the largest ships down to the expensive white 'duck' for yachts, of so fine a texture that it can be used by the yachtsmen for trousers."

"How do you manage to sew such material?"

"There have been sail sewing machines in use, but I cannot say that they are a success altogether. And so hand sewing is the general rule. We use for Seas Over.

A sudden thaw in spring is a common enough cause of the swelling and overflow of rivers, but few people have experience of what might be called "magic rivers," which disappear almost as suddenly as they are born. One such, however, is described by W. H. Mallock in his account of Cyprus, entitled "In an Enchanted Island."

On a certain evening there was a succession of thunder showers, and then, all the night, a heavy and ceaseless downpour. "This," said my host, in the morning, "ought to make a river." I asked what he meant by this, and he answered that the river below us was merely anything more than a dry bed of pebbles, just as it was now.

But generally once—sometimes three times—in the year it would suddenly fill with water, flow for an hour or two, and again become dry and silent. I felt that the sight must be curious and wished that I might be able to witness it.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon a servant came to my bedroom and asked me to go into the garden. There I found my host with an opera glass, standing on the bank.

"Look!" exclaimed he, pointing. "It is coming. Listen! You can hear it."

I listened and looked. I at last caught a sound, faint and uncertain, as leaves rustling in a dream. Then suddenly, far away on the plain, I saw something flash, like the head of a pointed spear. Gradually this prolonged itself into a slim shining line, which presently took a curve. For a time its course was straight. Then it curved again.

In ten minutes, over the brown surface of the fields the water had stretched itself like a long, silvery snake, and the sound I had heard, growing every instant more distinct, explained itself to the ear as the voice of the stirred pebbles. The river channel skirted the bottom of the garden, and thus, as the flood went by, we had every opportunity of observing it. It pushed itself forward, headed by a mass of bubbles and scum; it split itself into fierce rivulets, which, a moment later, were drowned in the body of the stream; it gurgled against banks; it circled into transitory whirlpools.

Gradually, as we watched, its volume seemed to diminish, and in an hour's time there was only a trickling rill, over which a child five years old might have stepped.—Youth's Companion.

Bunch Grass.

"The bunch grass which grows so luxuriantly upon the western plains is a curious plant," said a ranchman yesterday. "It grows everywhere throughout the west wherever there is the slightest rainfall, and in the greatest luxuriance along the river bottoms. It is a godsend to the grazing industry, and although a homely plant, possesses more of the fattening qualities than the far famed blue grass of old Kentuck. Indeed, much of the fast horse flesh of the mountain districts owes its staying powers to a diet upon this succulent grass. Spokane, for example, took its full allowance of bunch grass in his collish days. Bunch grass grows in thick hummocks, or bunches, as the name would indicate.

Half a hundred sharp pointed spears often arise from a single hump, and often to a height of eighteen inches. In the spring it is a delicate green, but later on dries up, but cures to perfection upon the root. During the winter cattle dig with their noses for this grass concealed beneath the snow. However, if the snow is covered with a crust, steers are thus cut off from their usual food and die off in large numbers, as it is a peculiarity of a steer that it never uses its hoofs in removing the snow from the familiar pasturage. Horses, however, paw through the snow with their hoofs, and thus stand the hard western winters better than cattle. The buffalo always makes use of the hoofs in uncovering the food, and somewhere down in Kansas there is a stock farm where this faculty of using the hoofs is being developed by judicious crossing of buffaloes with the native cattle.—Minneapolis Journal.

Beethoven's Last Piano.

The "Musikverein" or House society," Bonn, has recently acquired Beethoven's last piano. It was made by the court piano maker, Konrad Graf, who died at Vienna in 1851. He went to that city in the beginning of this century, and soon gained a reputation by the excellence of his pianos. The instrument in question was expressly ordered from him by Beethoven. In consideration of his deafness, it was made with four strings to each key, instead of the usual three. Owing to the strength of its tones, Beethoven used it almost exclusively in the last years of his life. After his death it passed into the hands of the bookseller, Franz Wimmer, of Vienna; and, after the marriage of his daughter to a Swiss clergyman named Weinmann, it became the property of the Widmann family in Berne. Its genuineness is proved by a certificate of documents, and confirmed by the authority of Johannes Brahms. It is now in the house in which the great composer was born at Bonn.—London Standard.

He Died as Does the Swan.

A peculiarly pathetic incident marked the closing of the life of Alonzo E. Stoddard, the well known Boston baritone, who died with typhoid fever. As he lay on his cot in the hospital breathing his last, a sudden inspiration seemed to revivify him, and, to the wonder of all, he sat upright in his couch and began to sing in his familiar, robust voice one of his favorite operatic solos. He never finished the song, either, or with more beauty of tone. The song was sung from beginning to end, the last notes died away, and just as they ended the singer fell back in his bed, dead.—Peoria Transcript.

The Largest Book Published.

The latest edition of Webster's Unabridged, in the quantity of matter it contains, is believed to be the largest volume published. It will surprise many to know that by printers' careful reckoning it contains eight times the amount of matter that is in the Bible, being sufficient to make 75 12 mo. volumes such as usually sell for $1.25 each. But the best thing about the book is that no space is wasted. It is crammed with useful knowledge for every person who has learned to read.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE

TO THE

North American Review.

Arrangements have been made for the coming year which will maintain for the Review its unrivalled position among periodicals, and render it essential to every reader in America who desires to keep abreast of the times. From month to month topics of commanding interest in every field of human thought and action will be treated of in its pages by representative writers, whose words and names carry authority with them.

The forthcoming volume will be signalized by the discussion of questions of high public interest by the foremost of men of the time, notably by a controversy on Free Trade and Protection in their bearing upon the development of American Industry and Commerce, between the two most famous living statesmen of England and America,

The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE,

AND

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE.

This discussion, embracing the most important contributions ever made to an American periodical, will begin in the January number.

It is a significant fact—as showing the unparalleled popularity and usefulness of this periodical, and its wide influence upon public opinion—that the circulation of the North American Review is greater than that of all other American and English Reviews combined.

A Daily Paper FOR 1 Cent a Day.

A daily newspaper now costs but little more than the old-time weekly. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an impartial, independent newspaper. It is a member of the Associated Press. It prints all the news and sells it for 1 cent a day. Mailed, postpaid, for $3.00 per year, or 25 cents per month. This is $3.00 per year less than the price of any other Chicago morning paper. The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is not a blanket-sheet. It is a condensed paper. You can read it and still have time left for an honest day's work. It is a daily paper for busy people. No one who has the advantage of a daily mail service need longer be content with a weekly newspaper. The circulation of the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is, with a single exception, the largest in the United States—it exceeds that of all other Chicago dailies combined. You ought to read a daily paper. Why not try the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS?

DREAMS.

In dreams I walk in pleasant ways,
By mingled streams in sunny dells,
Where pine-cone alleys and beauty dwells,
And sapless grass glow through happy days.

Dreams of friends whose faces I fain would see,
I dream of love that cannot fail,
Of joys that never rise nor pale,
Of hopes that beckon till the hunt.

In dreams I hear the songs of birds,
I see the stories of happy lands,
I feel the charge of loving hands,
I catch the drift of tender words.

They are but dreams, and I, alas,
Awake to weep my vanished bliss
Awake to feel the truth of this—
That dreams can never cease to pass.

I sometimes wish I never had dreamed
About the things I long for so,
For then my heart might never know
How dear their sweet fulfillment seemed.

Will let me dream, for oftentimes
The pain is over the day is long,
My soul awaks, my heart so weak,
I fain would lose the happy visions.

The happy chimes that fancy rings
Across the dreary moors of life;
I fain would see amid my strife
The peaceful towers of many hopes.

MARTHA.

"She's a good gal an' deserves to be happy if anybody does!"

Old John Compton gave the wheel of his wagon an emphatic twirl around the axle which he had been greasing. His boy was standing by his side, and received an ovation. Removing his funnel behaved hat, he wiped the moisture from his wrinkled brow.

Behind him was his cabin, and in its entry his wife was at work. In front of him lay his crops exulting in the sunshine. He took the prop from the axle; then he joined Jim's wife.

"Mother," he said, in the same disquieted tone that had characterized his soliloquy a moment before, "mother, you think Martha's made up her mind about Berry Bradley an' I wouldn't do no good to reason furder with her?"

The woman turned from the churn, and drew near to him. Her movement was slipshop, her face as grave as his; sighing, she said:

"Do my good! Not a particle. I've been agin it, John, the Lord's my witness. I've suffered torments; not a blacker night's rest in a month have I had. But what's to be done? It's the Lord's will, I reckon. You don't know nothin' about a mother's feelin's—you can't. It aint natur'; but I've got some to go by. I was ma'ried to my father an' you know, though such matters kin pass better betwixt women folks, 'case they mingle more in sociable ways.

"Last night I couldn't rest. You was sound asleep, John; I heard a mouse's ast-irrin' in the child's room. I got out o' bed and crept 'cross the entry, an' stopped in the door. I hev the girl in my arms jest as I hev in my prayin' in thar to herself, 'thout a speck of a lights.

"I peeped in at the door, an' saw the pore gal's face in the moonshine. In all my born days I hain't seen such misery on a human countenance. She was as dead white as a corpse, a-settin' on the side o' the bed with her arms crossed, bendin' for'ard an' back'ard, a-moanin' an' a-groanin' in wildness.

"I knowed 'twas kase we'd been a-talkin' agin Berry, an' I went to her an' knelt down by her. She's a pore feeble little thing anyway; she never was much stout.

"After awhile she told me all about it from beginnin' to end. Berry sister tore up the letter he had brought from the post road to school mighty nigh every day—three year ago 'fore he talk to drink'n'. She begged me to hide it. Since, he never opened her mouth about it, an' you know he didn't come to see her seven times as often as Clem Craig, so how's we know?

"She don't dispute that he's trifin'. He's a-lays been kind an' lovin' to her, sho says an' has promised time an' agin to stop drinkin'. She thinks she can get him to give it up. He proved to her, at meetin', yesterday, he had learn't, he hain't teached a drop o' anything in-toxicatin' in over three weeks. He says he never will agin; that's no use. He 'boat them that's tied to liquor. He 'boat them that's tied to liquor. He 'boat them start agin, an' what ud come o' her?"

The hardness in the woman's voice got the manner's sympathetic articulation, and she went silently back to the churn. She continued her work but the dasher in her unsteady hand struck against the sides of the churn with unwonted force. She was wiping her eyes on the skirt of her bonnet.

The subject of the conversation just reported was the only living creature of the old couple; their other children had died before they had passed the period of infancy. Martha was the pet, the joy of their lonely household. More than once the neighbors had expressed themselves against what they considered to be dotingness on the indulgence of the girl on the part of the father and mother.

"She'll be eternally spiled," quoth one.

"She's the only gal in the hollow 'at kin afford to wear shoes in summertime; next thing you'll hev a-ridin' a-hav'n' a boss an' buggy," said another.

The girl herself had spoken of late months last year. The most 'at common folks kin give their children is a month 'twixt hayin'-by time an' Christmas. Some complained an old crone with a ragged brood of ten children dependent on her.

His wife's graphic recital of the girl's unhappiness touched the old farmer deeply. He could frame no reply. Walking restlessly across the puncheon floor he shaded his eyes from the glare of the afternoon sun and gazed westward, where he descried a couple advancing along the road, through the fields. It was Martha and her lover—a slight, girlish form in a homespun gown, a burly young countryman with a shambling walk.

They came to the cabin together, both silent. The girl's features were regular and pleasing; her face deep and serious; she was about 18 years of age, the young man 23.

"What you come in an' rest?" she asked, in a restrained tone, with a dubious and stolen glance at her parents.

He complied, manifestly abashed, gave the occupants of the entry a gawky bow and a mumbled "Howdy," and took a seat on an empty sofa, leg against the wall, which, in his immediate vicinity, was frescoed elaborately with strings of red pepper pods hung up to dry.

The titillating dust and odor from this vegetable made him long to sneeze. His excessive timidity or bashfulness, however, thwarted such an outbreak.

As a rule, young men in this region when they go "a-sparkin'" have little to say. Berry Bradley, wide different in many respects from the average "Sprout Hollow" swain, was no exception to this rule. If you had seen him, as he sat there, you would have taken him for an immoveable mute. The pepper pods had incited his eyes to tears, yet he did not have the courage to alter his position. Yet sat he, looking through the blur as patient as a statue in a fog.

Besides, no other seat invited occupancy save a dismantled candle box near Mrs. Compton's chairs. The discomforts of Old John Compton gave the wheel of his wagon an emphatic twirl around the axle which he had been greasing. His brow was puckered, his voice assumed an-ration. Removing his funnel behaved hat, he wiped the moisture from his wrinkled brow.

Behind him was his cabin, and in its entry his wife was at work. In front of him lay his crops exulting in the sunshine. He took the prop from the axle; then he joined Jim's wife.

Boom the Traverse Region.

The Traverse City business men's association have called a meeting to be held at Traverse City, Feb. 13th, having for its object a systematic scheme of advertising for this region. In their circular they suggest the following plan as one method of inaugurating the work.

Such parties as are most directly interested in this matter should, by themselves, or their representatives, meet for general discussion at an appointed time and place.

At that meeting the following questions might be considered:

First, the territory to be included in the movement.

Second, what interests are involved, as for instance transportation lines, summer resort associations, proprietors of towns or villages, manufacturing industries, real estate men, etc.

Third, to what extent, and in what way can these various interests be enlisted in pushing the development of the territory and advancing the enterprise.

Fourth, how can finances be provided for inaugurating and maintaining a systematic and well digested plan of operations.

Fifth, the advisability of calling a convention of all who are, or who are likely to be interested in the matter, at an early day, at some place to be decided upon at the initial meeting.

Other points will suggest themselves to all.

Business on a Cash Basis.

Chicago Herald.

There was a time in the history of the country when the credit system was an absolute necessity. Farmers who did not have wool to sell received little or no money, except when they disposed of their crops and fat stock in the fall. Teachers and many other public employes were paid for their services semi-annually. Few mechanics received their pay oftener than once a month. Many of them received no wages till the job they were employed on was finished.

But this state of things no longer exists. Farmers sell some products almost every month during the year. Persons in the employ of the state, county, town or school district receive their pay monthly. Weekly payments to mechanics, domestic servants and common laborers have become general. Persons engaged in almost every kind of employment are not only well paid but promptly at a specified times. They have accordingly little or no occasion for buying goods on credit. Still in the opinion of many, more persons contract small debts than at the time when pay-days were uncertain or at best very far apart. The custom of anticipating salaries or wages has become general among numerous classes. They never enjoy the pleasure of having ready money. They are expected to visit their creditors at a certain hour every time they receive their pay. A society that requires its members to pay cash will produce good results.

Cash payments for goods promote thrift and prosperity. Southern farmers, before the war, were always in debt and at the mercy of their creditors. Yankee farmers, however, who raised few commercial crops, kept out of debt, and many of them became wealthy. The credit system is expensive because it involves many risks. Every manufacturer and dealer adds a certain percentage to his prices to cover losses caused by selling goods to persons who do not pay for them. Those losses fall eventually on the last persons who buy the goods. No one expects to buy a postage stamp on credit. If he has not the money to pay for one he cannot mail a letter. No one expects to buy a railway ticket on credit. If he has not money to pay his fare in advance he must remain at home. The like is true in regard to riding in street cars. Tickets to places of amusement are not sold on time, but for spot cash. No trouble occurs on account of these arrangements, and none would occur if every retail store conducted business like a postoffice, railroad or theater.

The February number of this magazine contains the second paper of Jefferson Davis' "Andersonville and Other War Prisons," "Why I am a Protectionist," by H. K. Thurber, "The Auditorium at Chicago" by John McGovern, "The University of Michigan" by Adele M. Garrigues, and a choice assortment of poems and fiction by popular authors.

Godey's.

The February number of "Godey's Lady's Book" opens with an illustrated poem by Ellen Callaly. Several valentine stories and poems follow, with a very bright sketch, "Hans in Kelder," by K. M. H. A good laugh can be enjoyed by reading "Major and Mrs. Hannibal Hawkins," by the popular author, Belle C. Greene. "$5,000 for a Wife" grows in interest, while "A Wheel of Fortune," by Olivia Lovell Wilson, begins to prove a wheel in reality. "The Cotter's Saturday Nights," by H. Ashmead, is well rendered; and Augusta S. Prescott gives some valuable hints in "A Year in the Home." The children's corner cannot fail to interest the little ones. Several excellent illustrations, new fashions and fancy work, with full departments upon household, fashion, items of interest, etc., completes one of the best numbers yet published by the enterprising proprietors.

Wide Awake.

The February Wide Awake opens with a good Persian ballad, "Abu Said," by Mary E. Bradley, followed by a stirring episode of western military life by Lieutenant Fremont, entitled "Snow shoe Thompson." There is an inspiring story of Greek boy-life, showing the effect of keeping a good ideal before a young lad's eyes. G. Hamlen tells a bright instance of a young girl's presence of mind in her story of "The Frogskin Mikado," and Mrs. Fremont will interest all readers with her account of "Eli Carson," in the second of her "Will and Way Stories." Grant Allen concludes his serial, "Wednesday the Tenth," in triumph; Mr. Stoddard in his serial of "A Rough Boy" is proving that young Gid Granger is "no slouch." The Norse serial by Boyesen comes to a close with the escape of the "Viking's sons" from the grip of a real bear. Miss McLeod's second Acadian story is finished. One of the very best of John Brownjohn's stories is given in the School Series, "The Wicked Waterbury Clock." Mrs. White gives artistic girls a good business hint in her article on Dressmaking in the "Business Openings" series. Mrs. Claflin's Margaret-Patty letter is full of subtle social wisdom. Alexander Black's "Confessions of an Amateur Photographer" is piquant reading. "Men and Things" abounds with good original anecdotes and curious lore. The poems of the number are by Mrs. Whitton Stone, Mary E. Bradley, Mrs. M. E. Butts, Clinton Scollard and Martha Young; "A Sad Case," one of the best of the long poems, is very amusing in text and pictures by Gordon Browne, the popular English artist. Wide Awake is $2.40 a year.

North American Review.

The January number of the North American Review will be rendered memorable by one of the most brilliant features which have ever appeared in an American periodical. This is a discussion between the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone and Hon. J. G. Blaine on the Tariff, Mr. Gladstone advocating free trade and Mr. Blaine protection. Whatever can be said on one side and the other of this subject will be said in these articles in the most telling and impressive way by these two great masters of controversy. Mr. Gladstone's article will occupy between twenty and thirty pages of the Review, and Mr. Blaine's reply will be about the same length, if not longer. It will be a battle of intellectual giants.

The articles will be published simultaneously, by Mr. Gladstone's consent, and, as they take up so much space, this issue of the Review will be enlarged to admit of the usual number and variety of papers on important and timely topics.

Letters From Hell.

"Letters from Hell" is the title of a book, issued in pamphlet-form, by the Oxford Publishing Co., of New York. There is something repellant in the title, but it is not flippant nor yet hortatory. The preface of this volume is from the pen of George MacDonald, LL.D., who has a very high opinion of the literary and religious merits of the production. The writer must have been a kind of Moody, or rather John Bunyan with slight variations. It is singularly out of touch with the destructive thoughts of to-day, and will be read extensively as one of the curiosities of literature."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Babyland for February, as usual, is full of good things for the children.

Joe Shores is drawing with Guyles & Nash's team.

Alfred and Jacob Vandeusen went to Elk Rapids with a load of wheat.

E. L. Stafford's mule got down last week and he had to knock it in the head because it wouldn't get up; wood out his collection, and the good American and good foreign pictures meet upon a common ground of sensible commercialism appreciation.

Zola's Programme.

The Paris correspondent of The Dagbladt of The Hague states that Emile Zola's last work, "Bete Humaine," will be followed by "L'Argent," which will deal with Bourse speculation and, to a certain extent, with politics. Then will follow "La Guerre," of course a naturalistic work, treating of the army, the war of 1870 and containing a long dissertation on the surrender of Sedan. The next book will conclude the Rougon-Macquart series, and will tell us how all the characters not already killed off will end. As soon as the series is completed, which will be in 1891, M. Zola intends to devote himself exclusively to the stage. He will then be 52 years of age, and will confine himself to the production of original plays, that is to say, plays which have not been adapted from his novels. M. Zola at present regrets, continues the Chevalier Salvador (The Dagbladt's correspondent in Paris), that he ever put "L'Assommoir," "Nana," or "Germinal" on the boards. He owns that he has made a mistake, and I am assured that he will never attempt to adapt "La Bete Humaine" for the Parisian or any other stage.

PRACTICAL SIDE OF FREE ART.

How Fashion Affects the Price of Paintings.

The principal reason given for maintaining the present tariff upon works of art is contained in the statement that reducing the number of foreign pictures imported will increase the probability of sales of American pictures, and that the great number of French works in the market pushes out the American. Now, this is one of those half truths seemingly plausible, but easily answered if considered.

To begin with, works of art appeal to the æsthetic sense, the educated taste and intellect; they are not, in the ordinary, material sense, necessary. Eminently necessary to any complete or even moderately advanced civilization, they yet are not essential to life; they are not good to eat or to wear, and they would be expensive as fuel.

Consequently, we cannot legislate the pictures of any especial nationality into the market. By putting an exorbitant duty upon foreign broadstuffs, textiles, leather, you might in any civilized country force native bread, clothes, shoes, upon the most enthusiastic advocate of foreign manufactures, because food and wearing apparel must be had. Nature and climate have settled that question; it is not left to taste. But let X be a foreign painter, Y an American painter, A, B, C, D, etc., picture buyers. They know the works of X and want them; you put upon them so high a duty that A, B, C, D cannot afford them. Will they go and buy Y's pictures? Not at all; they do not require them. They will say, "We will wait a while till we can afford to pay the premium on X's pictures." Meanwhile, as far as A, B, C, D are concerned, the market lies idle until eventually the foreign seller profits by a still higher price.

Again, by a commercial law, sales of pictures breed other sales. Perhaps the premium may be raised, "Then would not multiplied sales of foreign works of art increase the passion for foreign pictures alone, to the prejudice of native ones?" This is unlikely; picture buying is largely a fashion. There are true lovers of art who appreciate as well as admire, buying the best, because they know the best and it gives them most pleasure. It is such buyers who make the continued creation of good art possible; but the mass buy because it is the fashion. A purchasing one of X's pictures because B, C and D have them, and he wishes to be correct as a collector.

Fashion is, in part at least, a fictitious thing, and by keeping up the duty on foreign pictures we deliberately increase this fashion by enhancing their prestige.

A very simple illustration may be useful; go into a hatter's and price two articles. They look equally good, but are marked $8 and $10. Why is one more expensive than the other? the buyer asks, and is answered that it is a foreign hat. Immediately, and without realizing the difference, he begins to examine the hat to find out why it is the better. He feels as if it must have some hidden intrinsic value, because it costs more. The fashion for buying French pictures has its excellent origin in the fact that the splendid contemporaneous French school produced most of the great modern masters. But fashion naturally exaggerates and sees good only in its own particular direction, and we aid it by keeping the duty up.

Take off the handicap and you enhance the prestige of native work, and prestige at house is what it needs more than anything else. Abroad its excellence is handsomely recognized. The foreign artist can live and produce more cheaply than the American, but works of art cannot be treated upon the basis of minute manufactures—the greater must include the less, and the general prestige and furtherance of native art is far more important than any consideration of the proportionate scale of daily expenses in Europe and America.

The second reason given for keeping up a duty is that otherwise cheap rubbish would flood our market. This is easily answered: first, no real artist competes with rubbish, and secondly, no duty will keep out cheap rubbish. Such work can float any duty, except an absolutely prohibitive one, and a prohibitive duty cannot be legislated because, in justice, no one can draw the line between pictures which shall be admitted or excluded. It is probable that for some time after the abolition of tariff on works of art great numbers of foreign pictures will be imported, including many bad ones; but rubbish, floated in, will find its level. The strength of the purchaser of foreign pictures is in buying good ones; his weakness is in buying bad ones. The more bad ones are bought the more will more average foreign works depreciate, the sooner will the buyer wood out his collection, and the good American and good foreign pictures meet upon a common ground of sensible commercial appreciation.

The Paris correspondent of The Dagbladt of The Hague states that Emile Zola's last work, "Bete Humaine," will be followed by "L'Argent," which will deal with Bourse speculation and, to a certain extent, with politics. PRINTERS' INK.
PRINTERS' INK is just what it is, purports to be, "a journal for advertisers." It is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—the trade journal, so to speak—of American advertising. It tells the bona fide and unsophisticated advertiser in plain, pleasant English how, when, and where to advertise; how to write an effective advertisement; how to display; what newspapers or other media to use; how much to expend—in fact, everything at every point that admits of profitable discussion. If you advertise at all, PRINTERS' INK can help you. Perhaps you expend but TEN DOLLARS a year in advertising; if so, PRINTERS' INK may show you how to obtain double the service you are now getting for that the money. A year's subscription costs but One Dollar; a sample copy and Book Five Cents. Advertising is an art practiced by many but understood by few. The science of PRINTERS' INK is understood it thoroughly. Study their advertisements as an exposition of ours than twenty-five years, will help you. Address,

KENTUCKY'S PIONEERS.

THE EARLY MOTHERS WHO COULD PROTECT THEMSELVES.

Women and Children as Indian Fighters. Mrs. Davisses' Strategic Movement for the Capture of a Lawless Water Enemy of Her Husband—The Story of "Sharp Eye."

In the early settlement of Kentucky, the boys, and even the women and children, became as thoroughly soldiers as the men. This was the result of their surroundings. They were educated to it, and lived at a time when it was necessary to practice it daily. There were few women on the frontier but could load and fire a rifle, and many of them could do it with as fatal accuracy as their fathers, husbands and brothers. A fair illustration is found in the case of a Mrs. Davisss, whose husband was among the early settlers of Lincoln county. She could shoot an Indian with as steady a hand as Daniel Boone himself. One day a white man came to her husband's cabin who had stolen some property from him, and who loss a bad character generally.

Mrs. Davisss was alone with her children when this desperado called, and, knowing her husband was on the lookout for him, she resolved to capture him. Upon his entering the cabin she asked him if he would not "take a drum"—no pioneer's home was ever found without its whisky bottle, which was kept as a remedy for snake bites, etc. She put the bottle on the table and told him to step up and help himself. He set his gun against the cabin wall to comply with her invitation, and, after a hearty pull at the bottle, he turned to find himself looking into the muzzle of his own rifle, which Mrs. Davisss had picked up while he was drinking, cocked it, and stood with it leveled at his head. When he asked her what she meant, she informed him that he had stolen her husband's property, and she meant to keep him there until his return, and she did. She stood guard over him until her husband's return, when she delivered to him her prisoner.

The boys were no less brave and manful. To fight the "Injuns" was the first thing they learned, and, by the time they could lift a rifle they knew how to use it. Many instances and incidents could be given illustrating the heroism of the border boys, of which the following may be taken as a fair sample: Among the early settlers of Hardin county was one Silas Harn, an expert hunter, a thorough backwoodsman, and an inveterate Indian hater and fighter. Whenever an Indian incursion was made in the state he was one of the first on the trail, and he pursued them relentlessly and with the keenness of a bloodhound. His keen eye, and prowess in skirmish and battle, won from the Indians the name of "Sharp Eye."

On one of their many incursions into his neighborhood, Hart pursued them with a few chosen followers, and before they reached the Ohio shot and killed their chief. The savages vowed vengeance against him and his family, and shortly another incursion was made by them under the leadership of the brother of the fallen chief. As usual, Hart was first on their trail, and the savages retreated toward the Ohio. The whites finally despaired of overtaking them and returned home, when the Indians turned upon their trail and became the pursuers instead of the pursued. Hart reached his home about dark, and, having been fatigued from his long tramp, slept soundly all night, little dreaming of danger lurking nigh.

Next morning, just as the family were sitting down to breakfast, the savages appeared at the door, and the dead chief's brother shot Hart dead. His son, a lad of 12 years old, sprang up, seized his father's rifle and shot the murderous savage. As the red-skin fell across his fallen leader, the brave and undaunted boy, with a large hunting knife, scalped him to the heart. But the odds were against him, and he and his mother were carried away captives. It was the intention of the savages to take them to their towns and torture them, but they were finally ransomed and returned to their friends.

The same Davisss mentioned above was surprised one morning in August, 1782, by Indians. They had approached his cabin during the night, concealed themselves, and waited for him to make his appearance. Davisss, a little after daybreak, got up and stepped out of his cabin. He had proceeded but a short distance from the door when, turning, he beheld a number of savages behind him and the cabin. Seeing there was no chance to render his family assistance, he fled to the nearest station, which was five miles distant, for help.

The Indians made prisoners of his wife and children, the eldest a boy 12 years old, and, knowing Davisss had escaped, they soon left with their prisoners, hoping to escape beyond the Ohio. Davisss gathered a force, and pursued so rapidly as to overtake them before night. As usual, when about to be brought to bay, the savages essayed to kill their prisoners, but were too closely pressed by the whites. It seemed, however, succeeded in mocking down the boy and scalping him. The boy was not killed, only stunned by the blow, and almost as soon as the savage left him bounded to his feet, exclaiming: "Darn that Injun, he's got my scalp."

The boy lived to grow up to manhood, but was ever after "bald headed"; the hair would grow no more on that part of the head which had been scalped. He never forgave the savages for rendering him prematurely bald headed, but sought eternal vengeance against them. In the summer of 1792, ten years after his experiences detailed above, a band of Indians raided the settlement, and stole a number of horses. Young Davisss joined a party in pursuit of them. When the savages found that they would be overtaken they ambushed the whites, and in the skirmish that ensued young Davisss was killed. Thus died Indian fatality clung to him.—William Henry Perrin in Louisville Courier-Journal.

Endangered the Train to Save Oil.

The following story is told of a German railroad brakeman who lives in this city: The train on which he was brak'ng chanced to be out after dark, and, as Jake had neglected to fill with oil the lamps in the rear end of the hind caboose, he concluded that if the train should happen to be out late the supply of oil might be exhausted. So Jake modestly takes the lamps down, blows them out, and places them inside the coach. During the night the passenger train was side tracked to allow a fast mail to pass, and in turning the switch a fellow brakeman noticed that there were no lights in the rear end of the coach. Going to Jake, he said, "Where are your rear lights?" "Oh, I was put them out, as I thot we could needs them if we was out late."—Cincinnati Times Star.

Agassiz and Dom Pedro.

When Agassiz was lecturing in Rio de Janeiro, Dom Pedro was then about going to war in Paraguay, but he had been greatly interested in Agassiz's lectures, and the naturalist, quite as a matter of course, wrote a note to his fellow scientist, the emperor, begging that if he could spare any time from the war he would send up some specimens of Paraguayan fish. Mrs. Agassiz reproved her husband for the liberty he took, but the professor serenely responded that the emperor, as a naturalist, would not misunderstand his request; and the professor's student instinct was correct, for specimens of Paraguayan fish, forwarded by the emperor, now enrich the cabinet of natural history, left by Agassiz to Harvard university.—New York Letter.

Masculine.

Tom, who had been forbidden to climb trees in his new trousers, had disobeyed, and was receiving a lecture from his father for injuring his clothing.

Fearing that a flogging was to follow, Tom sought to create a diversion.

"Pa," he exclaimed, "my teacher says nouns are masculine gender and some feminine; now I know which they are—so you."

The father's curiosity was excited; he was fairly trapped. "No," he said, "which are they?"

"Masculine," said Tom, "cause they wear boy's pants,"—and for that time he escaped the switch.—Youth's Companion.

What We Should Say.

A little boy—instead of a little wee boy.

A silver dollar—instead of a large silver dollar.

He drove the horses—instead of he drove the carriage.

He came through the doorway—instead of through the door.—Good Housekeeping.

The Largest Book Published.

The latest edition of Webster's Unabridged, in the quantity of matter it contains, is believed to be the largest volume published. It will surprise many to know that by printing and electrotyping it contains eight times the amount of matter that is in the Bible, being sufficient to make 75 12 mo. volumes such as usually sell for $1.25 each. But the best thing about the book is that no space is wasted. It is crammed with useful knowledge for every person who has learned to read.

A Scrap of Paper Saves Her Life.

It was just an ordinary scrap of wrapping paper, but it saved her life. She was in the last stages of consumption, told by her physicians that she was dying and could live only a short time; she weighed less than seventy pounds. On a piece of wrapping paper she read fr. king's New discovery, and got a sample bottle. It helped her, she bought a large bottle, it helped her more, bought another, and grew better fast, continued the use and now enjoys healthy, rosy plump, working life sounds. For sother particulars send stamp to W. H. Cole, Druggist, Fredonia, N. Y. Trial bottles of this wonderful discovery free at r. u. Hines & Co's drug store.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE

TO THE

North American Review.

Arrangements have been made for the coming year which will maintain for the REVIEW its unrivalled position among periodicals, and render it essential to every reader in America who desires to keep abreast of the times. From month to month topics of commanding interest in every field of human thought and action will be treated of in its pages by representative writers, whose words and names carry authority with them.

The forthcoming volume will be signalized by the discussion of questions of high public interest by the foremost of men of the time, notably by a controversy on Free Trade and Protection in their bearing upon the development of American Industry and Commerce, between the two most famous living statesmen of England and America,

The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE,

AND

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE.

This discussion, embracing the most important contributions ever made to an American periodical, will begin in the January issue.

It is a significant fact—as showing the unparalleled popularity and usefulness of this periodical, and its wide influence upon public opinion—that the circulation of THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW is greater than that of all other American and English Reviews combined.

Inwood.

FEB. 4.—This is curious weather for this time of year. It rains as easy as in summer time.

The four-year-old son of Moses Bowdish died last Friday with diphtheria, and was buried Saturday at Barnard cemetery.

Wm. Harris, supervisor of Norwood, attended the extra session of the board of supervisors at Boyne City this week.

G. V. Nash was taken with the grippe last Saturday.

Norwood town board extended the time for collection of taxes one month last Friday.

Rev. Mr. Haynes of Charlevoix will preach at the Hilton school house next Sunday at 3 o'clock.

Albert O'Brian and George Wells were home from the lumbey camp on Sunday. They report busy times in the lumber woods now.

Albert Beattie has cut ten acres of fallow this winter. These young Norwood farmers are builders.

Wm. Bolton is breaking a fine team of two year-old colts this winter.

W. J. McGeagh and Son are getting a fine lot of logs into their mill yard this winter.

Edwin Cook is sick with sore eyes. O. D. Hilton can give an opinion as to the cause.

What is the matter with the town of Hayes? I see the Sentinel correspondent is on the war-path again. Why don't you Hayesites give the Sentinel correspondent some kind of office and shut his mouth. "Turn the rascals out and put in reformers."

SCHOOL REPORT FOR JANUARY.

The following are the average standings for the month ending Jan. 31st:

A grade—Mary O'Brian 99, Calla O'Brian 97½, Lillian McGeagh 99, Allen McGeagh 98.

B grade—Dora Wheaton 98, Nora VanDusan 98½, Orten VanDusan 96, Geo. Harrington 99, Nelson Harrington 94.

C grade—Oscar VanDusan 87, Bell O'Brian 95, Emma Wells 93, Floy Harrington 91, Celia Sanburn 95, Katie Cummings 90, Henry Harrington 91.

The following were not absent or tardy during the month: Calla O'Brian, Lillian McGeagh, Allen McGeagh, Dora Wheaton, Nora Van Dusan, Orten Van Dusan, Anna Wells, Emma Wells.

GLADYS JEFFERIES, Teacher.

Eveline.

FEB. 4—Beautiful weather this, for February.

Lumbering in this section has come down to a standstill for lack of snow. Some are well nigh discouraged over it, but it is our opinion that before the month has gone we'll sing snother tune.

M. J. Staley has arrived home from Beach's camp, Boyne City, where he has been hauling logs. They have been obliged to stop hauling logs—scarcity of snow.

Joe Tuttle is fast improving in health.

Mrs. Geo. Jarman, who has been confined to her bed with inflammatory rheumatism for three months, if able to be up again.

Miss Ruth Trudgeon has had an attack of the grippe.

Eugene Bodwin, of Boyne Falls, was in town Sunday, visiting his mother.

Mr. F. E. Miller is now sick with the grippe.

Several teams from here have arrived home from Beach's camp, where they have been hauling logs.

Ye scribe has been fortunate enough to escape la grippe so far, but reporters are no more liable to dodge it than editors. What say you Bro. Ironton? Spect it will be our turn next.

Your reporter is soon to make preparations to have the "W. R. Brown railroad" extended from Advance to Ironton. After this has been completed it will no doubt be put through and terminate at Charlevoix. The route would go through a level and good farming country, and why shouldn't we have a railroad?

The township board will meet at Ironton on the 18th.

S. Parker can now be found most of the time in his fish house at the point near the ferry. He reports spearing some good trout.

Mrs. Peter Provost, of Ironton, died last Friday night and was buried on Sunday. They lost an infant child a few days before.

The members of the M. E. church will give an oyster supper at the church next Tuesday evening. Feb. 11. Bill 50 cts.

The Bay Springs correspondent of the Citizen says: "A letter from Wellington, Ohio, tells us that wheat has grown all winter, that grass is green and peach trees in bloom there." As ye scribe was formerly from near that town we can imagine how nice it must look at this time of the year.

Advance.

SCHOOL REPORT FOR JANUARY.

No. of pupils enrolled, 32. Average daily attendance, 28. Pupils neither absent nor tardy, Hannah Von Platen, Victor Lacroix, Josie McShea, Laura Smith, Jessie Davis, Mary McShea, Martha McShea, Mabel Phillips, Mirtie Healey, Dollie Karleskin, Nellie Karleskin, Esther Lacroix. The following are the names of pupils having the honor of 100 per cent in deportment: Mattie Willis, Hannah Von Platen, Josie McShea, Eva Wood, Jessie Davis. Monthly rewards for spelling received by Nellie Karleskin, Mary McShea, Victor Lacroix, Eva Wood, Jessie Davis, Laura Smith, Herman Martin. After spelling down each night during the school month we find Eva Wood and Victor Lacroix tie champion spellers of the school.

Monthly average standings are as follows:

A grade—Mattie Willis 97, Hannah Von Platen 97, Josie McShea 97, Victor Lacroix 96, Eva Wood 95, Delos Phillips 92, Eddie Rogers 91, Carrie Dennie 84, Mabel Phillips 85.

D grade—Claud Phillips 86, Joseph Morrison 90, Bennie Dyer 70, Maud Backenstose 75, Clare Brooks 62, Willie King 80, Frank Healey 84, Charley Smith 72.

ADDIE LEWIS, Teacher.

Pleasant Valley.

FEB. 3.—There are several cases of la grippe in this community. Wm. McClain, who has been quite sick with it is better, so he is on the streets to-day.

At the last meeting of the P. Y. E. club officers were elected for February as follows: President, Chas. Ward, vice-president, Miss May Newville, secretary, Mrs. Ann Newville.

Dr. Kay, of Boyne City, nilled Rev. Mr. Burge's appointment at the school house Sunday.

There seems to be a dearth of news items in this vicinity at the present time, but Alva Kuhns has done his share toward furnishing the usual quota by practically demonstrating his belief in the negative side of the question, "Is marriage a failure?"

There were from 17 to 20 teams hauling logs and wood from the valley to Boyne City last week, several from Charlevoix; but the thaw has spoiled the sleighing so but few are on the road since Thursday. At 9 o'clock this evening men are out shoveling snow on the bare spots, which looks as though they were getting a little anxious.

W. C. Burdick is the successful competitor for the wood job for the Boyne City school.

Boyne City.

FEB. 5.—On Friday, while Lewis Zess was working about some saw logs, his cant-hook slipped and struck him on the knee-cap, bruising him badly and making a lameness which will probably last him for a week or two, at least.

Chas. A. Hoes of Chandler died of relapse of grippe on Monday, Feb. 3.

The high school reading club gave a Shakespearean social on Friday evening of last week, which was entertaining and well attended.

The first silver medal contest under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. of Boyne Falls, was held on Friday evening, Jan. 31. There were six contestants, all of whom did very well; but the real contest was between a daughter of Mr. Kinsley and a son of Mr. Jepson, both of whom were well-nigh perfect, there being only a slight percentage in favor of Miss Kinsley, to whom the judges awarded the medal.

The board of supervisors are in session this week. To-day the question of submitting the removal of the county seat from Boyne City was voted on by the board and was lost. The question of buying the Chapman property for a poor farm was under consideration today, but at last advices no conclusion had been reached.

Jay Palmer, while at Muncelona on Jan. 25th, slipped down while standing near the railroad track, and was caught by the train in some manner and dragged until he was severely injured. He was brought home on Monday, and having recovered somewhat from the nervous shock, is now slowly mending.

Wilson.

Soft weather for sleighing.

Allie Delong is laid up with la grippe.

Wm. Wing is recovering from his recent illness.

Miss Katie Wilson spent Sunday at East Jordan, with the family of Prof. Waldron and other friends.

Mrs. R. Sherman, nee Cooper, goes to Charlevoix to-day to visit her parents.

Miss Annie Nowland went home to Boyne Falls to see her sick relatives for a few days last week.

Joe Mosher now takes the position of night watch, while H. Bergman takes his place at the lever.

About 300,000 feet of logs are in the mill yard. Over 100,000 feet have been drawn to East Jordan.

We have received a copy of the state temperance paper, called the Michigan Messenger, formerly The Center, which is published at Adrian, Mich.

We hear that Dr. Dean died at East Jordan on Monday with an aggravated form of la grippe or pneumonia. His death seems doubly sad as no relatives nor near friends were here in his dying hours. But he was well cared for by strangers.

Ironton.

FEB. 5.—By the appearance, things just now we are going to lose our sleighing. The ice is in fine condition for skating and the boys are improving their opportunity.

The Jarman boys are rushing out the logs at a lively rate, but they have about 100,000 feet on skids waiting for snow.

D. N. Gregory is looking happy. It's a boy.

Mr. and Mrs. Mike Green are also rejoicing over a young son.

Mrs. Mitchell, an Indian women living here, died last Wednesday of consumption and was buried Saturday in the Catholic burying ground.

Mr. Parker's good success at fishing has encouraged several others to try their hand at it, and there was several fish houses on the ice, but the big blow last night made sad havoc with them. Capt. Guard's was found smashed into kindling wood on the peninsula point, and the rest were found on the beach not much hurt.

We did not have the grippe last week, but were so near it that scribbling seemed too much of an undertaking.

Harnard.

Lumberman look rather blue, on account of loss of sleighing.

Everybody is recovering from la grippe.

A four-year old son of Moses Bowdish was buried here Saturday. Diphtheria was the cause of death.

Mr. Meggison had his baby christened Sunday by the pastor.

The tax-gatherer is around the neighborhood this week.

Miss Abbie Matchett and Miss Clara Adams have joined the grange.

Burgess.

FEB. 4.—Mrs. Willis who has been very sick is a little better.

Miss Jennie Willis is home on a short visit from Cheboygan, where she has been teaching. She was called here by the sickness of her mother.

Miss Alta Crum, who has been visiting her aunt, Mrs. Hamlin, has been taken sick with the influenza.

Almost everyone has had the grip. This weather is calculated to cheer up the "poor tax-payer" that is out in the storm a straddle of a load of logs. If we had as many brains as some people think they have, it might contribute to the enlargement of our cranium, until some of the "poor log straddlers" might think our head was swelled, so we are satisfied as it is.

Dated at Eveline this 27th day of January, 1890.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is correct and true copy of the proceedings of the township board of Eveline at a meeting held on January 27, 1890.

R. A. MILLER,
Township Clerk.

Distant Thunder

The farmers of this country do not possess, at least they do not use, the power that properly belongs to them. They, beyond any other class, should have an influence in making and administering the laws and shaping the destiny of these United States. Their numbers, their intelligence, their conscience, their conservative temper, all entitle them to commanding political influence in both National and State affairs.

What they have lacked, and lack now, are first, proper organization, and second, a determination to use their dormant power.

The indications are that Samson is growing restive in his bonds, that he is turning himself about in preparation for some move that will startle the lookers on, and waken the people to a true knowledge of the situation. Heretofore there have been Patrons of Husbandry, Farmers' Alliances, Farmers' Wheels, Farmers' Clubs, and other combinations of farmers, all useful in their way, all successful in the work they undertake to do, but some, at least, likely to be permanent in character; but there has been no organization intended above all else to advance the political welfare of the farming class, and to force a recognition of its true position in the affairs of the nation. There has been a widespread feeling that there ought to be such an organization, but never until now has the time seemed ripe for it to come into existence.

Any one with a quick ear may detect the sound of distant thunder, and the signs are that the whole heavens will soon be overcast—not as a portent of evil, but of good for our common country. Not very much longer will the hard-working farmer be crowded out of his appropriate seat at the first table.—Philadelphia Farm Journal.

Electric Bitters.

This remedy is becoming so well known and so popular as to need no special mention. All who have used Electric Bitters sing the same song of praise.—A purer medicine does not exist and it is guaranteed to do all that is claimed. LOCAL NOTES AND NEWS.

L. E. Allen and family arrived home today.

☞Buy only Rifenburg flour. Iron Duke is the best.

Wm. Ferguson is having the dining room of his hotel papered.

A large amount of logs is being hauled to Nicholls' mill yard this week.

Saturday was clear and cold, and the boys had great skating on Round Lake.

☞Another barrel of Silver Thread Sauer Kraut just received by O. W. Smith.

☞Six bars of the celebrated Pure Gold Soap for 25 cents at O. W. Smith's.

Our Little Men and Women for February is full of good things for the children.

Harbor Springs' electric fire alarm system will be in operation before the end of the week.

☞Patronize home industry. Use Rifenburg Milling Co.'s flour. Iron Duke is the best in the market.

J. L. Newberry of Petoskey and Miss Donna Godfrey of Minneapolis, Minn., were married last week.

Thos. Keating slipped on the ice today, and sprained an ankle so that he had to be assisted to his home.

Dr. Crouter sold his cottage on the north side to W. H. Cooper. Mr. Cooper will have a pleasant home.

☞For sale, at five cents on the dollar, 200 bushels of cockle seed. Apply to Rifenburg Milling Company.

The East Jordan Lumber Co. have secured the services of Cash L. Rifenburg as sawyer in mill No. 1, at East Jordan.

Mel Livingston has gone to East Jordan to work for the Enterprise, Editor Dixon having an attack of the grippe.

A. C. Newman has bought the old building on the school grounds formerly used as a wood house, and will move it off.

Don't forget the firemen's club dance at the village hall Friday evening. Room for everybody and a good time for all.

☞Call and see our samples of ball programs, invitations, wedding cards, address and society cards, etc. New styles for season of 1890.

Saturday afternoon the largest boat to sail the lakes was launched at Bay City. It was the steamer Alex. Nimick, 220 feet long and 41½ feet beam.

☞For the balance of the oyster season I shall handle no bulk oysters but the best large select oysters. Standards and Selects in cans. O. W. Smith.

It was a good social held by the Y. P. S. C. E. at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Wood on Tuesday evening. There was enjoyment and profit and money in it.

Frank Roade, head sawyer in White's mill, Boyne City, broke his leg this week, and Cash Rifenburg will fill his place until he takes his position at East Jordan.

Last Thursday Mrs J. G. Stevenson of Hayes fell from a hay mow, while feeding the cow, and considerably injured herself, but no bones were broken. At last account she was feeling fairly comfortable.

And now the attorney general comes out with an article in the Detroit Tribune in which he says that in his opinion the new election law, passed by the last legislature, does not apply to township or municipal elections.

Dr. Crouter has purchased the Weaver house on the corner north and will expend about $1,000 in improvements, making it one of the sightly and pleasant homes in Charlevoix. Burns and Gaskill have the contract for making the improvements.

Chief Joseph Ojibwa, the last remaining chief of the Chippewas in the vicinity of Sault Ste. Marie, died Thursday of la grippe. He was old, some persons fixing his age at somewhat over 100 years. Three sons and an aged widow are the immediate mourners.

An exchange says that no better method has yet been devised for making times better than for all persons to pay as they go. The present stringency in the money market would certainly be greatly relieved if every man would pay his small debts and thus keep the money in circulation. A nimble dollar is worth more to a community at large than a thousand, if they are securely locked in a vault and allowed to remain there while debts continue unpaid. A bird in the hand is better than a whole flock in the woods, and if you desire to help the good cause along and make yourself a beneficiary to your fellow men, pay your small debts promptly, and your large ones if you have any such, as quickly as possible. By following this rule, times will very soon grow better.

I. M. Weston, of Grand Rapids, is being boomed by the democratic press as a likely candidate for governor. He would undoubtedly run well in the Northern and Western portions of the state. Many men inferior to Mr. Weston, in ability, have already occupied the distinction of governor of the Wolverine state.—Citizen.

Better Mail Service Wanted.

East Jordan gets two mails a day from the railroad, why not Charlevoix?

There are two trains each way, daily, on the G. R. & I., arriving at Petoskey from the south at 12.25 a. m., and 3.20 p. m., and from the north at 9.25 a. m. and 2.40 p. m. All mail for Charlevoix from the north, and from the south in the afternoon, now lays in the Petoskey postoffice over night, and does not reach Charlevoix until the next day at noon. By starting from Petoskey at 4.00 p. m., we could receive all mail arriving in Petoskey after 8.00 a. m. the same night by 7.30 or 8.00 o'clock, gaining at least 16 hours in time, besides receiving our Detroit and Grand Rapids morning papers the same day as published. The morning mail could start from Petoskey the same as now, or as much earlier as the postmaster could get it ready.

For the out going mail, if it could start from here at 7.30 or 8.00 in the morning, it could go both north and south the same afternoon, giving a net gain of at least six hours from time of leaving Charlevoix, to reach the train, and a gain of 24 hours to most of the mail that is, or could be, posted here in the morning. The afternoon mail could leave here same as now.

East Jordan does not receive as much mail as Charlevoix, yet they took hold with vigor and got an increase of service to two mails a day, and Charlevoix certainly ought to do as much.

Give us two mails a day.

Anniversary and Surprise.

Last Friday evening, Jan. 31st, was the fifteenth anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Strang, and soon after 7.30 in the evening about fifty of their friends took possession of their residence, without previous notice, and proceeded to make themselves comfortable, which was encouraging, in a very satisfactory manner. The entire evening was devoted to pleasure, not least being a generous supper provided by the ladies who managed the affair. Following the supper, Rev. Mr. Reed, on behalf of the company, presented to Mr. and Mrs. Strang an elegant colored glass water set, berry dish, nut dish, and one half dozen individual salts, the cards accompanying bearing the names of the Charlevoix W. C. T. U. The younger element of the company amused themselves with games and music, and the older folks with pleasant chat until a late hour. It was a genuine surprise, well managed, and altogether was an event long to be remembered.

Historical Society.

The program at the last meeting, held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ainslie, included the following: Organ solo, Miss Artie Kanagy; recitation, Miss Lina Washburn; paper on the Monroe doctrine, Mr. Vote; "Literature in Colonial Times," Rev. Mr. Rood; vocal duet, "I Know a Bank," Misses Edith Mason and Artie Kanagy; recitation, "Mississippi Mud," given with Santa Claus," Miss Mary Wood. The next meeting will be held with Mr. and Mrs. O. S. Washburn. Paper by Miss Josie Ottens, on "African Literature since the Declaration of Independence."

The Council's Action Explained.

J. A. Vote has been employed as engineer of the fire department and janitor of the village hall at a salary of $250 a year. The bid of W. J. Stevenson for the same service was $175.—Journal.

This is intended as another intimation that the people's money is being squandered. But it must be understood that besides the matter of cost, the equally important one of efficiency must be considered. What are the facts? Mr. Stevenson appeared before the council and testified that his experience consisted in running an old stationary engine in Canada for some time ten years ago. Mr. Vote has had practical experience as an engineer in Charlevoix for several years, and nearly up to date. He is also an active member of the fire department, while Mr. Stevenson is not. In the examination of the latter gentleman by the council, he did not satisfy that body that he was qualified to operate the steamer with due regard to the safety of the machine and the good of the fire service. Candid citizens will approve the action of the council in this matter.—Sentinel.

This explanation is all right, and if true or believed to be true, no member of the council could do differently and be honest with himself and his constituents. The constituents can best express their approval at the polls.

Now if the proceedings of each meeting of the council, as published in the "official" organ, could show as explicitly as the above item does, or nearly so, the reason for any action involving the expenditure of money, the tax-payers could determine more easily if their money was spent in a proper manner, and the result might even be so satisfactory as to stop the noise of numerous "kickers." Let every resolution involving the expenditure of money, in any form, be published in full, and the vote thereon, so the people can know what is done, and why.

Willing Workers.

In Consumption Incurable.

Read the following: Mr. C. H. Morris, Newark, Ark., says: "Was down with a severe attack of lung trouble, and physicians pronounced me an incurable consumptive. Began taking Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, and now on my third bottle, and able to oversee the work on my farm. It is the finest medicine ever made."

Jessie Middlewart, Decatur, Ohio, says: "Had it not been for Dr. King's New discovery for Consumption I would have died of Lung Trouble. Was given up by the doctors. Am now in best of health." Try it. Sample bottles free at F. G. Hines & Co.'s drug store. 5

Boston's Literary Janitors.

Not long ago Gen. Corso received a compliment from a well known woman of letters, who spends the winter months in Boston, to the effect that her copy of the Atlantic Monthly was invariably delayed much after the time when it should reach her, and she wondered how it did come to hand. When finally it did come to hand the leaves were always cut and it tore the appearance of having been read in transit. She was inclined to the belief that some one connected with the postoffice, a carrier, perhaps, was in the habit of taking it home to read before delivering it. The complaint seemed reasonable, and an inspector was detailed to look the matter up. He soon discovered that the postoffice and its employe were guiltless in the matter, but that the janitor of the hotel in which the lady had her apartments was in the habit of retaining her Atlantic for a time for his own perusal.—Boston Record.

Parnell's Counsel.

It is reported that the total amount paid to Parnellite counsel is £20,000. Sir Charles Russell received £7,000, Mr. Lockwood and Mr. R. T. Reed (both Q. C's) were paid £3,500 each, Mr. Asquith, Harrington and Mr. Asquith, £1,500 each, and Sir Charles Russell's son and the two other juniors were each rewarded for their labors by the payment of £1,000.—Montreal Star.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

Mistakes of the "Citizen."

EDITOR JOURNAL.—The editor of the Boyne Citizen persists in making mistakes. I certainly understood, when on the stand in the Anderson examination, that the testimony was to be published, and I had not the slightest objection. I kick because it was not published as given, but was either full of mistakes,—not "one or two," but many,—or else, as I heard a witness express it the other day, "so garbled as to screen as much as possible parties suspected, and be in as weak and poor shape as might be for the witness testifying."

Boyne, Mich. ARTHUR E. MARTIN.

"He Would Get all There was in It."

EDITOR JOURNAL—Since the days of our Revolutionary sires there have been men of ability to come to the front to manage affairs. But unfortunately, since the big "salary grab," whenever they get an office, they are apt to take all the law permits for their services. Even one of our town officers, who is anxious to cheer the poor tax payer, takes all there is in the office with the greatest complacency, at least we never heard any complaints that he did not. If the bill of the sexpervisor was too large, why did not the poor "tax-payer," who sits astraddle of a bench, stop it, as was his duty to those that put him there? It might be, if the tax-payer should accept of his offer to do the supervisor act in one part, for five dollars, he would be like an old gentleman once said of a minister who was noted for his thrift and close bargains. A son in law said of him in the presence of the old gentleman, "why, if the Savior was on earth, the Elder would sell him for less than Judas did." "Guess not; guess not, young man; if he had the deal to make he would get all there was in it," said the old gentleman.

Hayes, Mich. I. S. W.

A Stove Used as a Bed.

In the north of China the climate is quite cold, and there are no stoves or fireplaces in the wayside inns. In some of the general rooms are small charcoal braziers, but the bedrooms, which are very scantily furnished, contain neither stove nor bed. In their place is a brick platform long enough for a man to stretch himself at full length upon and raised a foot or two from the floor, with an opening in the side. Into this aperture the servant pushes a pan of burning coals, and when the bricks are thoroughly heated the traveler spreads out upon them the bedding he has brought with him, and lies down to rest on his stove. —Exchange.

The Diamond Market.

It was rather an innovation to the old time jewelers to discover in some of the leading magazines and newspapers advertisements offering their wares at prices which strike the casual reader as being remarkably cheap. One of the oldest houses in New York, for instance, has offered to sell diamond rings, which "are fit for the hand of any lady or gentleman in the land," at prices varying from $55 upward. The high standing of the house naturally stamps such an offer as being sincere an honest, but certainly most men would be impressed with the idea that a good thing for that amount of money could not present many points of value.

A slight investigation shows that the general cheapening agency of machinery has at work in this branch of trade as in all the others. What formerly required the work of a single man for nearly a day—that is, the metal part of the ring—is now stamped out and fitted ready to receive the stone with a rapidity which is astonishing. The only cost to be considered is the rent of the machine and the value of the crude gold. Inserting a cheap diamond in the surface of the ring is about all the manual labor involved. The journeyman jewelers do this work with great rapidity, and practically there is very little cost to the jewelry firm beyond the first cost of the gold and the diamond.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Imprisonment by Deputy.

The Paris correspondent of The London Daily News, telegraphing recently, said: "A curious attempt to shirk imprisonment by substitution came before the Paris assizes this afternoon. M. Dubuse, landlord of a cafe, was sentenced the other day to forty-eight hours' imprisonment for having had concerts on his premises without a license. In France a defendant who is a householder is not taken from the court to prison, but is allowed a respite of two or three weeks or a month at his discretion. At the end of this period he receives a polite letter from the prison governor requesting him to call at his earliest convenience in order to serve out the sentence.

M. Dubuse during this respite found a pauper, who had just been discharged from Nanterre, and induced him to go to prison for 20 francs. Boulachon—this was the man's name—went off to the Petite Roquette, introduced himself as Dubuse, which name he signed on the visitors' book, and was locked up in a cell. His ragged appearance, however, aroused suspicion, and detection speedily followed. Bouliache was prosecuted for forgery and M. Dubuse as his accomplice. The jury, however, acquitted them both."

He Got the Quarter.

"If I gave you a cent, Bobbie, what would you do with it?

"I'd buy a postal card and write to you for a quarter."—Harper's Bazar.

PRINTERS' INK.

A JOURNAL FOR ADVERTISERS.

PRINTERS' INK is just what its purpose is to be, "a journal for advertisers." It is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—the trade journal, so to speak—of American advertising. It will tell in interesting and inspiriting advertise in plain, comprehensive, sensible way, when, and where to advertise; how to write an advertisement; how to display it; what newspapers or other media to use; how much to expend—in fact, discussing in every point the science of profitable advertising. If you advertise at all, you should read Printers' Ink. Persons who signed with Printers' Ink for a year in advertising, if so, PRINTERS' INK will show you how to do it with double the service you are now getting for one-half the money. A year's subscription costs but One Dollar; a sample copy costs but Five Cents. Advertising is an art practiced by many but understood by few. The readers of PRINTERS' INK understand it thoroughly. Study their advertisements as an experiment of what to do and what to avoid, and the lessons you learn, will fully pay. Address—

LOST ILLUSIONS.

This is the fairy forest of my dream,
Where heroes rode glittering arms right—
And the tall trees in the pale moonshine seem
To whisper tales of long ago, to-night.

Methinks the flowers are hushed to sleep, nor can
The mystic symbols which upon the moon
The white moss casts through yonder swaying tree—
Where I in solitary search must cross.

It is the same old fairy forest still;
But where are all the heroes dressed in gold?
And where the nymphs who bathed in the rill?
I thought them real—are yet the world was old!

I seek them now, but they shade my gaze
Lost dreams of youth and faith are never restored.
For I myself am he whose hands did erect
The substance from the image I adored.
—Fair N. Gerson in Philadelphia Ledger.

ONE SUBSCRIBER.

Phoebe Mumford came down to breakfast one morning in very low spirits. There seemed no doubt that the mortgage would be foreclosed at last. Her father's mind failed more and more. Everything was forlorn and wretched. She had been gazing at a rose colored picture of the past to which distance lent enchantment. She saw her buxom, comfortable, loving mother; her young aunts, who petted her; a kind though grave father; a lover, Billy Barton, who adored her, and went away to sea and who had not been heard of since. There was a little misunderstanding that she was too proud to explain. Now how gray and dull was life! The dear mother gone, and though doubtless she watched over her daughter, human eyes cannot see those loving angels. The aunts married, one in California, one in Colorado, one in Canada, with families of their own. The father changed, since the terrible illness that followed his wife's sudden death, to a trembling, querulous shadow, who regretted all her love and tenderness by finding fault with her for her having been born a girl.

"If I had a son," he used to say, "things wouldn't go to rack and ruin while I'm poorly. It's the only fault I ever found with your good mother, that she had a girl instead of a boy."

"Poor father! he used to be so different," Phoebe would say to herself, "and it is a shame that I am not a young man."

But still, when a woman finds herself unappreciated, her heart must ache.

A son never would have made the feeble old man so comfortable, waited on him so patiently, spared him so much. The "bound girl," little Hannah Jane, from the poor house, was bright and tractable, but there was still much to do; all woman's work, though nothing that could keep the heavy mortgage from foreclosing, or the man who farmed what land there was left "on shares" from cheating them unmercifully; nothing that brought money in.

Phoebe felt that, and it pained her more than the thought that her thirtieth birthday was close at hand, though no woman ever lived who did not shrink from that thought with a shiver of horror.

Wiping the tears away, Miss Phoebe left the table and took up the newspaper—a big New York paper full of politics, which she read to her father every day and which was almost his only pleasure. She glanced down the columns of deaths and marriages, and saw there no name that she knew. She read an account of the appearance of the sea serpent at the shore near a certain hotel, and of a frightful murder that made her blood run cold. She read the wise words of the weather prophet, who predicted a rising barometer, and glanced over the advertisements. "Spinkins' electric collar button, warranted to cure everything," offered testimonials from kings and warriors, and tempted her to go down and buy one for her mother would, had she had the money to throw away on a cruel imposture.

"DOBBS: Enclose, on receipt of ten cents and a stamped and directed envelope, will send to any lady or gentleman directions by which she makes a fortune at their own houses."

She was not much impressed by this magnificent offer. But here was something:

"WANTED in our office, a lady of education and refinement, a good talker, who has read a good deal. Salary $12 per week. Apply at once in person. Church member preferred.
COZZEN & CO.,
No. —— street."

"Dear me!" cried Phoebe to herself, "fifty dollars a week! I think I am refined. I certainly have had a good education. I read everything I can get to read. I am a church member. If I could get the place, I could go to business regularly like a man, give pa most of the fifty dollars a week, save the place, perhaps, and certainly buy the electric collar button."

Visions of her father restored to health and vigorous old age; of the mortgage paid off; of herself kneeling at her father's feet while his hands rested on her head and said: "My daughter, I no longer regret that God never gave me a son, since he sent me you," rushed through her mind. She slipped from the big horse hair covered arm chair, and, kneeling before it, hid her face in its great dimpled back, and with her handkerchief to her eyes, prayed to be helped. And when she arose it seemed to her that a strong, unseen hand had her; that there could be nothing to fear or dread; nothing before her but success.

She gave her father his breakfast with many smiles, and fairly laughed when he said: "Now, if you were a boy you could just go along with me to the polls and vote for Buffingham. I want that man to be elected, he's got the right views about property. But you're a girl, poor girl, and can't."

Little he knew what was in her mind. She read the political articles through and had just time to catch the train, giving Hannah Jane directions for the dinner.

"If I get the place, old Mrs. Williams must come and live here," she said to herself, as she walked. "I'd feel perfectly safe then, and she'd be glad to have the spare room and her board."

A fresh color was on her cheek, and a bright sparkle in her eye as she stepped into the car. She wore her very best things—precious and well saved—but she must look her best. And she did; for hope is as great a beautifier as fresh bonnet strings, and when reaching No. —— street she climbed the long and rather dirty stairs until she reached the office of Cozzen & Co., with a hopeful heart.

The door of the room stood open. The opposite roofs were visible through the unshaded windows. Some girls stood at a table folding pamphlets; others sat at another directing envelopes. Behind a barricade of walnut desk and iron railing sat a portly gentleman, bland, and wearing a good deal of white hair, from which a pair of round, black eyes, and a very round nose, blackened at the nostrils with snuff, peered out and gave him the appearance of one of those poodles which belies of years ago were fond of carrying about with them.

Another lady, with downcast eyes, was gliding from the room; and another woman, with rather a coarse manner, tossed her head in indignation as she pushed past the first.

"Poor things! they have applied for the place and have not got it," said Phoebe; but she could not feel sorry.

The portly gentleman arose behind his railings as she looked toward him, and bowed.

"Walk in," he said.

Phoebe also bowed politely.

"Your advertisement?"—she faltered.

"Yes, yes," said the gentleman, "I understand. We have had throngs of ladies here. H'm! Sit down."

"I do not know what your position is, sir," said Phoebe, feeling very brave—almost like the son her father had alleged she was not, she thought; "but I can do my best. I have an education. I am a church member. I read a great deal. I think I can talk a little on a subject I understand. And amongst so many books"—she glanced at the shelves—"I certainly should find the employment congenial; only I must go out of town every week."

"That would be very easy," said the gentleman. "You could arrange your hours to suit yourself. You are exactly the person we want. I see in your face that expression I look for in vain in so many female intelligences." The gentleman gave a little leap on his chair and spread his hands abroad. "Vivacity!" He repeated the action. "And with a perfect personal appearance. You are the very woman we need. I speak in a purely business way. We must think of these things. You suit us."

Could it be? Could it be? Phoebe trembled with joy. Fifty dollars a week—her dreams realized—her father happy! Meanwhile the gentleman arose from his seat.

"This," said he, taking a thick volume from a shelf, "is the volume."

Phoebe looked at it with a happy smile and waited for more.

"Have you ever taken subscriptions?" asked the gentleman.

"No," said Phoebe; "but I"——

"Ah, yes, you will be very successful, I am sure," said the gentleman. "We give you a list of streets, numbers, names of residents. You call with the book; ask to see Mrs. So and So, or Mr. So and So; send up your name; your card is preferable. You rise when the person comes in. How do you do, Mrs. So and So? I feel that you would be interested in this work and called to show it to you.' You then talk in such a manner that the person subscribes for the book. On receiving the money we give you the percentage. You see?"

"Yes," said poor Phoebe, who, under the revulsion of feeling, was on the verge of a fainting fit. "Yes. It is like the work with Dosem's Family Medicine, and the other books, who come to our house sometimes. But you give fifty dollars per week?"

"Fifty, dear madam!" cried the man, laughing and rubbing his hands gayly. "At ten cents on each book you can easily get a hundred subscribers a day—a hundred a week; sixty dollars for the six days' work. With your momentum—I see it in your eyes—you will make more."

Poor Phoebe began to feel better. It would be terrible work; not at all what she supposed; but—anything, anything for father and the homestead!

"This is a specimen copy," said the gentleman. "You buy this little book at wholesale for, shall we say, twenty-five cents. And you leave one dollar deposit for the book."

"Is that necessary?" sighed Phoebe.

"Well, we exact it of all," said the amiable Mr. Cozzen. "What would you have? We can't make exceptions; we should offend others."

Phoebe paid the dollar and a quarter, took the book and walked away, glancing at the outline of her "beat," which was far up town.

The book was a collection of receipts, advice to youth, selections from Bryant's poems and fun from old jest books. It had also many patent medicine advertisements bound between its covers, and four or five portraits of "beauties" with their heads on one side and a simpering smile upon their faces.

Poor Phoebe! she hoped against hope as the street car took her up town, and still cherished much more of that compelling energy than could have been expected, when her feet touched the red hot flagstones of Fifty-seventh street, and the dull residences stared down at her with half their doors closed with their wooden barriers that say to all who look, "Family gone to Europe." But yet there were steps that might be climbed, and Miss Mumford climbed them patiently.

She saw a sweet, old lady, who beamed on her at first.

"We've such a large library now, we can't really add to it. There's not room in the house for another book."

She saw a sarcastic lady, who said: "Greatly obliged for the attention; it is a wonderful book—wonderful, but I couldn't understand it. I have to read lighter things. My brain, you know, won't bear too much."

She saw a decided lady, who said: "No, no, indeed! oh, no!" and opened the door.

She saw a contemptuous young lady, who simply shook her head, and rang for a footman to "show this person out."

She saw a grandpapa with a dyed mustache and an eye glass, who was gallant and offensive. Then she received "regrets at homes" from angry servants, who knew her errand well, and felt that they had been troubled to open the door unnecessarily. After many long, hot, wasted hours she found that her next number was a drug store, and entered it, thankful for the cool shadow. She was hot, thirsty, wretched. She longed for a glass of the ice cold soda water, but had only a little change, which must serve for fares, in her pocket.

She stood before the counter and repeated her little story—her talk about the book. The druggist smiled as he glanced at the volume.

"I could not half such drash in mine house," he said. "You vaste your dime mit a book like dis."

"It seems worthless to me," said poor Phoebe, sighing.

"You get dook in, like some oder beeples, mit dem rascals," said the German. "You look dired, madame, and not well. Go home and rest—I advise you as a dooctor."

A customer, who had been looking at her, threw down the price of a tooth brush he had bought, and seizing his purchase, followed Phoebe out of the door.

"Let me see your book, madame," he said. "Very nice; I'll subscribe. Give me your book, I'll write my name and residence."

He did so. Phoebe thanked him, and tried to read it, but the figures danced before her eyes. Her head was so hot, so heavy, she must go back to Mr. Cozzen's, get her dollar, give in her subscription, tell him that she had failed. She would feel better after she had rested, she thought—better. How kind that man had been. But he subscribed for her book—she knew it well—out of sheer pity; as one gives alms to a beggar.

She was in Mr. Cozzen's office again. He looked at her out of his bush of white hair. His black eyes sat more like snapped-on beads than ever.

She had waited her day, risked sunstroke, failed in her effort, and crushed her hopes. What did he care, if he had one subscription more? A book agent was almost sure to get one, and hundreds toiled over the earth every day with the same results.

"Very foolish to give it up so," he declared. "The first day never counts. I have ladies on my list making a hundred dollars a week who got no subscribers on the first day, and——Oh, your dollar! Yes, yes! And here is your percentage—ten cents. But you ought not to despair when you have secured the name of Capt. Barton on your list. Well, good-day."

She was gone, threading the streets that led to the ferry. The heat first; then the rain. Was that the train coming? What a roar! How black it was! She staggered, but she did not fall to the ground. Some one caught her in his arms.

Out of darkness, out of rest, out of strange communion with her mother in another world, Phoebe floated back to life again. A woman sat beside her and fanned her.

"She's all right now," said a voice of the family doctor order. "Only faintness; not sunstroke."

Then peace again; and waking, much better.

"My poor father!" she sighed. "He must be so terrified! Some one has been so kind; but let me get to my father at once."

"All in good time," said the motherly woman at her side.

"Your father won't be anxious, Phoebe," said a man, and her only subscriber stepped where she could see him. "I found your name and address in your little note book. I went and told him you'd be home to-morrow. You don't remember me, Phoebe?"

Phoebe smoothed her dress and sat up on the chintz couch and looked at the speaker.

"You subscribed for my book," she said.

"But before that," said the man. "Before I had a beard and went away to sea with no hopes of being captain. Don't you know Billy Barton, Phoebe?"

"Oh!" cried Phoebe. "Is it you?"

"I thought I knew you," said Capt. Barton. "I followed you, wondering if I dared speak; and you looked so ill. So I was there when you fainted."

He took her hand and held it and lifted it to his lips before he put it down.

"The same sweet girl," he said, softly. "Good night, Peggy; will take good care of you. Every one who fails sick at this hotel knows Peggy."

By next morning Phoebe was well again, but Capt. Barton insisted on seeing her home.

"What did pa say?" she asked. "Are you sure he was not worried?"

"He said," replied the captain, with a smile, "that girls are never to be depended on, and that if he had had a son he never would have cut up such pranks."

Phoebe felt the tears rise to her eyes.

"The old gentleman is very much broken," said Capt. Barton. "He does want a son as well as daughter; don't you think so Phoebe?"

When he said that, he looked like the Billy Barton of the long gone times.

A few months afterward he asked the same question, adding;

"Won't I do?"

And so it came to pass that Phoebe, instead of ending her life as a solitary spinster married a man who loved her truly. The mortgage was paid off the old place, and the farm was no longer managed on shares. And the old gentleman, what with freedom from care and luxurious living, grew stronger and brighter in every way; much fonder of his daughter, too, as in the olden time. So that one day when Phoebe Barton came down to breakfast and sat waiting for those other two, and thinking of the day with which this story begins, she laughed softly to herself and declared:

"And I'm really the happiest woman in the world today. I believe, after all,—Mary Kyle Dallas in New York Ledger.

IT IS AN AGE OF SHODDY.

WHY DIFFICULTY IS FOUND IN GETTING A GOOD COAT OR CARPET.

The Shoddy Business Grows Immensely with Each Year, and the Makers of Spurious Cloth Are Protected by High Tariff Laws.

Considerable comment was excited in the last presidential election by one of President Harrison's speeches in which he declared that he had little sympathy with the demand for cheap coats, for a cheap coat, he claimed, usually covers a cheap man.

President Harrison was right in one sense. A man who has to wear a coat that is threadbare and out at the elbow loses his self respect. He feels humiliated when men look at his shoddy garment and make remarks about its seedy appearance. He feels cheap.

But a cheap coat may be a shabby coat are not the same thing. No man who wears a good coat becomes a cheap man simply because he bought his coat at Mr. Wanamaker's bargain counter. Like the flowers that bloom in the spring, that has nothing to do with the case.

But why it is so hard to get a cheap coat of good quality?

The answer is simple: It is shoddy.

It is not generally known to what an extent the shoddy business is carried on in this country, nor how the business has come to regard itself as one of the legitimate industries of the country. In the United States alone there are 150 mills, the United States used 19,000,000 pounds of raw shoddy, and in 1890 they used 32,000,000. There are more than 100 shoddy mills in the United States, and about $50,000,000 is invested in these enterprises and in handling rags.

The cause of this remarkable development affords a curious illustration of how a congressional committee can be hoodwinked by those who have axes of various kinds to grind. In 1875 the joint executive committee of the wool growers and the wool manufacturers asked for duties which discriminated heavily against the ordinary cheap clothing, such as is worn by the great majority of the people. They gave as an excuse for this request their desire to protect the American working people from foreign shoddy goods.

These goods," they said, "if admitted at moderate duties, would take the place of our sound clothes." They further told the committee that the American manufacturer would be compelled to "follow the foreign market and surrender the home market to the foreigner."

Now, then, what was the action of the committee in view of this "state of things?"

To prevent the deplorable results pointed out by the growers and the manufacturers the committee recommended a duty of 12 cents a pound on importations of foreign shoddy, and, in order that their action still more effective, duties ranging from 80 to 120 per cent were placed upon the imports of manufactures of wool. The petitioners, as usual, had gotten what they asked for. The people who had knocked the doors were opened.

But note now the consequences: Now that protection was to be no longer the dumping ground for European shoddy, the woolen manufacturers rushed with eager haste into the shoddy business themselves. Already in 1880 the shoddy used by American mills had grown to three times the quantity used in 1870; and the country tasted beans should never be sold before $2 a bushel.

To Mr. Breckinridge's question as to how one can make beans, Mr. Bowen was obliged to reply that the poorer classes did. Mr. Bowen was further obliged to admit that the shoddy business had had increased expense to the poorer classes.

The whole subject appears to have been discussed and settled without the intervention of Boston. As dear beans in the Hub would mean a famine in that quarter of Massachusetts, it is to be presumed that the last has not yet been heard of the attempt to increase the duty on Boston's one dish to 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The Shoddy Industry.

Editor of New York Evening Post—In these days of protectionists' outcries it is interesting to note the appearance before the senate committee recently of a gentleman from Boston asking that a duty of three cents per pound (quite similar to 140 per cent. of its cost) shall be put on imported shoddy dextrine, when there is not a single pound of this dextrine manufactured in this country. Who does he propose to protect? Perhaps a future investment of this pet protectionist is supposed to be the interests of the thousands of textile, paper and other manufacturers who are using this raw material in their respective industries.

Though the domestic manufacturers are making dextrine here from a basis of corn starch at less than half the cost of potato, yet the imported article is preferred, and they are unable to compete. The gentleman from Boston owns considerable number of them in their native state grow on high mountains, without exposure to a bracing atmosphere; and they are now cultivated in moderately warmed and freely ventilated greenhouses. They are, therefore, relatively flabby plants, well adapted to the decoration of our rooms.—J. Dybowski in Popular Science Monthly.

"It's Great to Be One Legged."

A little ragamuffin, who had lost one of his legs, hopped around on a crutch one rainy afternoon last week at the corner of Broadway and Park place. His shoe was torn, and everything about him suggested that the foot inside of it was wet. The boy was decorated with pity or repelled by the sight of his misfortune, and hopped from one puddle to another, and stood in each one listlessly for more than one out of the shoe. Several other boys followed around with him. At times they tried to pull him down, but he was very quick and had a way of bringing his crutch down on their shins, and they made them wary about coming within his reach. Suddenly he stopped and said:

"I feel hungry. Guess I want something to eat."

He left his companions playing in the street, hopped up onto the sidewalk and accosted the first man that came along. The man looked at his crippled condition and gave him a dime. The next man fumbled in his pocket and hopped out a copper. The third and fourth paid no attention to him. The fifth gave him and came back to his companions, tossing the money he had received as though this was no unusual occurrence.

"Goin' to leave you fellows," he said; "got to get home. Ma's sick."

As he hobbled away the other boys looked at him with envy in their eyes.

"Gosh," said one of them, "it's great to be one legged. You don't have to work and you'd more money, too."

The others nodded assent.—New York Sun.

A New Nautical Signal.

A new nautical distress signal has been successfully experimented with in England, the notable feature in this device being that no stick is required, and there is no back fire, the rocket taking the form of a metal cylinder, in the base of which is the propelling charge, above this is being a charge of tonite, and above this again a star composition. The rocket is placed in a phosphor-bronze bracket, which is screwed or let into the rail of the ship, and, when it is required to fire it, a firing tube is placed in the center of the rocket, and to this top of this a lanyard is hooked; the propelling charge is fired by simply pulling the lanyard, and the signal is impelled upward at one impulse—the wire fuse by which the detonating charge is exploded being at the same time ignited, and this burns until the rocket has reached the maximum height, which is 600 feet, the stars are thrown out, giving a brilliant illumination, and the tonite charge then explodes, the noise of the explosion being equal to the firing of a six pound gun, but, being high up, is heard at a great distance, in one instance, as reported, a disabled vessel fired a gun to this means brought another to her assistance from a distance of twelve miles. The full sized rockets are seven inches long and two inches in diameter.—New York Telegram.

Art Scholars.

There have been only two train robberies on the Mexican Central railroad since it was completed. The robbers started in with great enthusiasm, but so did the government, pursuing and killing every one implicated, and now a veteran brigand sits on a rock and sees a passenger train, with no fear of any wondering how many drummers and diamond pins are aboard.—Detroit Free Press.

Miliers Want Free Jute.

Though the farmer won't see it, his next friend, the miller, is beginning to tumble. The National Millers' association has petitioned the committee on ways and means that jute and jute cloth be bonded or put on the free list. The association alleges that, owing to the present tariff on these raw materials for bags, the cost of the bags used in exporting flour was increased from 33 to 50 per cent., and was a heavy burden on all exporters of flour." (Of course the farmers have no interest in this. They do not export flour like the millers. But what about grain bags, on which a duty far tax is levied?

A protectionist journal insists that it is not the custom house tariff but the railroad tariff that compels the farmers in Kansas and Nebraska to burn corn instead of coal for fuel. This is a superficial view. The custom house tariff not only prevents the farmer from profitably exchanging his corn for other taxed necessaries he needs, but the cost of the railroads has been nearly doubled at the same time and the cost of carriage has been thereby greatly increased. The cost of carrying corn on taxed rails is graduated according to the tax.—Philadelphia Record.

The Nature of Orchids.

The orchids, conquerors of the light, may well claim pardon for their triumph over their humble companions of the gardens, for their victory is fairly achieved. They astonish us when we first examine them, then charm us. Nature has been liberal with them, and they have everything. Their flowers are full of that curious charm that captivates. Their colors are harmoniously toned, and always bright and pure. Their odor is sweet and penetrating, but does not cloy. Notwithstanding their dead, many of the comic papers contain testimony to the fact that their composition has been of good guilt mines in the mines of wants—sometimes curious assemblies—curious as regards—as they are daily set forth in their apportioned space in the journals of the country. This agony column is a curious and worth watching, for the mysterious messages conveyed thus is that medium do not by any means monopolize the nuisance of the advertisements nor all the mystery.

It is said, if the reader be sentimental or diverting, if he or she be curious to the exquisite emotions of the tender correspondents, to hear from "Rose Blush" that time will not change her love, that the fragrance of it "remains as a sweet odor, and as the breath of life;" or that "Violet" intends to meet her "weeping Gaiters at the dear old haunt when the clock strikes ten." But there are sterner romances than these, in which glimpses are frequently obtained of the dismal type announcements, which are so frequently skipped by the reader. The romance of the fortune hunter is there, and many of the suitors of daring criminals are exposed to the views of readers of "ads" by the police announcements.

The reading of advertisements more so than the perusal of any other part of the newspaper reveals the inner life of the marts of life, justifies one against the proverbial sneer with pity or repels one with greed; brings one into sharp contact with sharp men, who are continually on the watch for their victims, deceive or defraud some trusting person; and yet there is pathos, misery, ambition and despair in all these, despair, implying one with the keynote to a hundred tragedies, ambition, which has invested in the world of inventions, it is in the advertising

Eveline.

FEB. 11.—The news this week is a little more scarce and is grippe.

The physicians are now reaping their harvest. Cause—grippe.

St. Valentine's day the next of importance.

An old-time proverb says, "A March in January, a January in March." Be this so, what will next March bring forth?

R. J. Tuttle, of Petoskey, spent Sunday with his parents.

Zero has not been heard from yet this winter; guess he has gone visiting.

Mrs. Geo. Jarman was sick only three weeks, instead of three months as stated last week.

To write was on the sick list two days last week, and wasn't the grippe either.

We were sorry this morning (Tuesday) to learn that our brother scribe, Trenton has at last been "took in" by the grippe.

D. Galbraith has traded his trotter to Joe Guyles for his oxen.

Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Peterson have lately recovered from an attack of the grippe.

Mrs. Chas. Peterson of Petoskey, who was thrown to the ground and seriously injured by a coasting sled last week, is the mother of W. A. Stanley of this place. Latest reports from her are that she is still very feeble, and unable to help herself at all.

There is to be a dance at David Snyder's on the 22d. All are invited.

One of our young married men (who is not afraid of anything) was out for a stroll recently, and wandered into a lonely deserted building. Soon he heard mysterious footsteps, and pulled a revolver to defend himself, when, behold! it was his little dog "Coly," which had followed him.

There has been a considerable increase in the number of sufferers from the grippe in the past week. The epidemic will undoubtedly not lose its hold upon the community for some time to come, and materially interfere with social and other arrangements. The following is a list of those taken down the past week with it so far as we have been able to learn: F. E. Miller and family; John Haley and family; Mrs. Robt. Newson; and Mrs. John Hayden.

Boyne City.

JAN. 10—Two inches more snow and the logs come in faster than ever.

White's saw mill started on Wednesday for the season. Shortly after starting the carriage caught a board and jerked it back. Frank Reid, the sawyer, was struck on the leg, breaking the bone about three inches above the knee. He is doing as well as could be expected.

Jay Palmer is still slowly mending.

Mr. Benson of Bath is visiting N. J. DeBart this week.

The second silver medal contest under the auspices of the Boyne W. C. T. U. was held Wednesday evening in the Presbyterian church. There were seven contestants from 10 to 15 years of age. All spoke nicely, to a large and appreciative audience. Miss Irene Boise gave the "Martyred Mother" and captured the medal. The next class formed will be of young people from 15 to 21 years of age.

Mr. and Mrs. Stroud of Horton's Bay were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Matt. Cunningham for two or three days last week.

Mrs. Jay Palmer and Mrs. Walter Ware of this place received a telegram on Friday evening announcing the death of their father in Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Ware started immediately for Cleveland. Mrs. Palmer was kept at home by reason of the serious condition of her husband.

Inwood.

FEB. 12.—The Norwood band will give a masquerade at the town hall on Friday evening, Feb. 21st. Music by Blakeley string band.

Several cases of grippe in town.

Another child of Moses Bowdish has the diphtheria, but is doing well.

Estelle Miller of Ironton visited at McGeagh's last week.

Owen Wood of Banks has drawn the champion load of hardwood logs so far—the load containing 2,500 feet.

Cash Pearl at Smithsonia's camp has some fine sheep. He feeds them linseed meal.

O. D. Hilton killed a beef last week that dressed nearly ten hundred pounds. Evidently Hilton don't live on tan bark.

At the meeting at Hilton's school house last Sunday, it was voted unanimously to ask Rev. Mr. Hayne of Charlevoix to preach every two weeks in the future.

On Tuesday morning fire caught in the roof of James Harrington's house, but was discovered by Mr. Harrington in time to prevent serious loss. A few moments more, however, and the fire would have been beyond control. It evidently caught from the stove pipe.

Wilson.

Weather is too mild for good sleighing.

Max Ostenburg, the Afton school janitor, is sick with "the inevitable."

Miss Wilson, teacher of district No. 3, spent Sunday at home in Banks.

Old Mrs. Bowen is on the sick list.

Nearly all the grippe patients are getting well.

The boys were glad to see the 10th come again. The two J. R's were kept pretty busy for two days, dealing out the cash.

The advent of a girl at Mark Sedgman's on Feb. 4th is worthy of mention. All doing well.

Pleasant Valley, please explain your item in regard to a certain young man demonstrating the negative side of the popular question. Don't keep us in suspense.

Pupils in district No. 3, neither absent or tardy the third month: Prudence Scofield, Max Ostenburg, and Forest Sheppard.

Elder Scofield went on Sunday last to his regular appointment at Sedman's. After services he was invited to Mr. Hauser's, where he united his daughter Lena to Wm. Reinhardt, in holy matrimony. Congratulations are in order.

Burgess.

FEB. 12—Bills are out for a dance at Newson's hall Feb 14.

E. H. Burgess has a contract for a large amount of lumber, and has a force of men and teams getting out logs for same.

Jake Marshall of Charlevoix and Frank Kane of Hayes, last Friday cut from timber that was standing 9,003 feet of logs, 4,000 of which was hard maple; time 9 hours. The boys say they can do it again for fun, marbles or money. Who can beat it?

John Ross returned home from Indian River last Friday where he has been in a lumber camp.

Would say for the information of our brother scribe of Inwood that some people wouldn't be satisfied with the earth but would want a slice off the moon; that's what ails Hayes.

Whitford & Cram's January scale of logs amounted to over $1,700.

The First Step.

Perhaps you are all run down, can't eat, can't sleep, can't think, can't do anything to your satisfaction, and you wonder what ails you. You should heed the warning, you are taking the first step into Nervous Prostration. You need a nerve tonic and in Electric Bitters you will find the exact remedy. Pride's Fall.

Tramp—Please, mum, I ain't had no food for three days. Can you give me something to eat?

Mrs. Slimdiet (haughtily)—My terms for board are $7 a week.

Tramp (straightening up)—Beg pardning for troublin' ye, I didn't know this was a boardin' house. I ain't hungry enough ter eat boardin' house victuals. Good day, mum.—New York Weekly.

DEMAND FOR FREE WOOL.

MR. BENNETT'S PETITION A HARD NUT FOR PROTECTIONISTS.

Three Were 530 Signers and They Were Among the Most Prominent Manufacturers in the County—Some Extracts from His Speech—What the Duties Do.

The hardest nut the high tariff party have yet had to crack was the recent appearance of Mr. Frank P. Bennett, of The American Wool Reporter, before the committee of ways and means with a petition for free wool, signed by 530 prominent woolen goods manufacturers. Mr. Bennett in presenting this petition said, in part:

"Among the 530 signers of the petition for free wool are Mr. Moses T. Stevens, of North Andover, Mass., the largest individual woolen manufacturer in the United States; Mr. G. Z. Sibbe, treasurer of the famous Middlesex Woolen company, of Lowell, Mass.; Mr. Arthur T. Lyman, treasurer of the great carpet mills at Lowell; Mr. Galen C. Moses, treasurer of the Wetumbo Manufacturing company, the largest woolen manufacturing establishment in the state of Maine; Mr. Jesse Metcalf, one of the largest woolen manufacturers and most influential citizens of Rhode Island; Mr. James Kitchenman, a large manufacturer of the city of Philadelphia.

"The astonishing feature of this unexpected list of names in favor of free wool lies not only in the character, but in the number of the signers. It has been hitherto asserted, on very high authority that the only manufacturers in favor of free wool are a few officers of large corporations, the number of whom does not exceed ten. But this list of signatures shows that the rank and file of smaller manufacturers are as willing to express their opinions in regard to the duties as are the great leaders of the trade. No effort has been made to secure the politics of the signers of these petitions. Among the manufacturers who petition for free wool in New Hampshire Mr. Charles J. Amidon, of Hinsdale, is a very influential Republican, Mr. A. W. Sulloway, of Franklin Falls, is an influential Democrat of national reputation."

"In the state of Rhode Island," continued Mr. Bennett, "the total number of looms in woolen and worsted mills is 7,461, and of these, manufacturers representing 4,683 looms, or considerably more than half the whole number in the state, have signed this petition for free wool. But besides these mills which represent the 4,683 looms, several spinning mills containing no looms, but which have in the aggregate 41 sets of cards, 15 combs and 54 knitting machines, have signed the petition for free wool. Among other signers whom I have not mentioned in Rhode Island are the celebrated Weybosset mills, of Olneyville, the equally well known Lippett Woolen company, of Woonsocket, the Peacedale Manufacturing company, of which Mr. Rowland Hazard is treasurer, and the great Atlantic mills, of Olneyville, by Owen Bros., agents.

"These Atlantic mills make ladies' dress goods, such as are also made by the Arlington mills, of which Mr. Whitman is treasurer, and the Owen Bros. actually own a considerable share of the mills which they manage. There can be no doubt that this growing demand for a revision of the tariff in the direction of reduced duties has had much to do with taking Rhode Island out of the list of Republican states and putting it into the ranks of the doubtful, and I will confess right here that, as a Republican, one of my reasons for engineering the distribution of these petitions has been the hope that this growing demand for a revision of the tariff in the direction of reduced rather than of increased duties might be complied with and satisfied under Republican auspices.

"The signatures to these two petitions, the one in favor of free wool and the other in favor of ad valorem duties, are from nearly every state and territory in which woolen manufactories are situated. A few wool growers have signed the petitions, but they were soon all found them in neighboring woolen mills, and signed them without solicitation. I have no hesitation in saying that a petition for reduced duties upon wool for the benefit of our manufacturers who furnish our domestic wool growers the sole market for their fleeces, would secure a great many signers among that portion of our agricultural population concerned in the raising of wool. The signers of these petitions do not believe that free wool means free goods. One of the most prosperous periods the woolen manufacturing industry has ever enjoyed in the United States was from 1883 to 1887, and this prosperity was not due alone to the war, but to the fact that the duty on raw wool was low, and the duty on manufactured goods was high enough to afford our mills abundant protection and to bestow upon our wool growers the blessings of an abundant home market.

"During that period American sheep husbandry expanded enormously, and in 1887 the number of sheep in Ohio reached a total of 7,355,507 head. Then came the increased tax upon wool in 1867, which continued unchanged until 1883, and, with the exception of the single year, 1868, the number of sheep in Ohio grew steadily smaller and more fully less after that date. In 1875 the number of sheep in Ohio had fallen to 4,100,288 head under the highest duties upon wool ever known, and now, when a little coterie of Ohio politicians stand in the light of wool growers and woolen manufacturers alike, and to such proofs of the destructive influence of the high tax upon wool as we have just presented replies merely with threats, we are certainly very sorry that they cannot take more reasonable ground. And, as one of the largest manufacturers and strongest protectionists in Philadelphia recently remarked, 'I would rather have four years of free wool, even with the risk of free goods at the end of that time, than to endure another four years such as we have just been through.'"

HOW WE GET THE IVORY.

The Elephant Industry and Its Relations to the Slave Trade.

It has been suggested by a recent writer that the extinction of the African elephant would achieve the suppression of the African slave trade, for if there were no ivory to carry to the coast the Arabs would have no occasion to maintain that fell institution in its foulest form. On the grounds we have hinted it is argued that the ultimate patrons of African slavery are those men among us whose amusement depends upon the perfection of the sphere wrought out of the choicest part of the elephant's tooth, and those ladies whose æsthetic taste would be offended with other than the soft, creamy, delicately grained surface for their toilet requisites, which no product but ivory can give.

Many will regard this long chain of responsibility as the mere fantastic creation of a philanthropic enthusiast, and certainly the abolition of the slave trade will be a slow process if it depends upon the establishment of an anti-ivory wearing league in the boudoirs and dining rooms and of Mayfair or the billiard saloons of the Strand. The prospect that the problem will be solved by the extinction of the great pachyderm is also remote. The yearly destruction of elephants is enormous, and obviously there is a limit to the supply, but it promises to hold out for a long time yet. Occasionally times of scarcity have been experienced, as, for instance, during the recent blockade of the East African coast by Germany, but the shipment to Europe continues with a remarkable regularity.

The perennial talk of an ivory famine has as yet come to nothing, a rise in price being sufficient to stimulate the supply and to some extent contract the demand. Those in the trade will tell you that magnificent tusks are now rare, but of medium size there is considerable abundance. How long that will last it is not safe to say, but as Africa is opened up the elephant's bounds will be circumscribed, and some fine day the last wild animal of the species will receive his quietus. Fifty years is the period which one authority in the trade ventures upon for the practical drying up of the ivory supply.

We consume a certain proportion of our supplies of ivory from Asia, but the bulk and the best comes from Africa. Indeed, a great part of what is nominally East Indian is really African, for it is sent from Zanzibar and Mozambique to Bombay, and such ports as are not required for bangles and carved work are shipped to England. More or less comes from Burmah, Siam, Cochin China, Ceylon, Sumatra and Java, the Siamese being the best of the Asiatic, which is spit to dicoake. The African is shipped from Senegambia, Guinea, the Congo, Benguela and other places on the west coast; Zanzibar, Mozambique and Sofala on the east; Cape town on the south, and from Tunis, Tripoli, Alexandria and Cairo, being brought down from the interior in caravans. London is the great market for ivory, and buyers both for home and abroad attend the four series of sales held at the London docks.

Everywhere through its direct trading connection with the west coast, receives a certain amount of ivory and has a series of minor sales, and Antwerp is now trying to cut into the trade, as an outcome of the Belgian efforts in the Congo Free State. At the last series of sales held in London only 75 tons were offered, but the quantities usually range from 100 to 120 tons. The last auctions in Liverpool disposed of 12 tons, and about 31 tons were offered at Antwerp. Last year the total imports of ivory into this country weighed 1,757 hundredweight. This would mean at least 60,000 tusks, and the destruction of 30,000 elephants for this market alone. France, Germany and America share in these supplies, but they also obtain ivory direct, more especially Germany.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Selling the Succulent Frog.

Two or three times a month a bright boy with a business like air visits the hotels and restaurants. He was encountered the other day in a down town lunch room, where he had just sold the proprietor a dozen fat frogs. They were neatly strung along a stick, and one man at first took them for reed birds. "I caught those down in the Neck," said the boy, "and it ain't no fun either, going into a ditch after them with a net."

"What do you charge for them?"

"Well, for nice, big ones, I can get sixty cents a dozen," answered the youth.

A German woman from some place "down in Jersey" peddles frogs, too. She is talkative enough, but when inquisitive folks try to find out just where the native froggy can be found, then she shrewdly scents a possible competitor, and thereafter remains as mute as the proverbial oyster.

The usual way to cook bull frogs, or corn frogs, as the boys call them, is, according to certain gastronomic authorities, a simple thing. Roll the frogs in cracker dust and fry them as you would an oyster. One gentleman of advanced epicurean tastes says that if the flavor of the succulent dainty is desired, it should simply be fried in butter.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Fashions in Diamonds.

Diamonds—fine diamonds especially—are as fashionable as ever. Jewels composed of clustered diamonds of different sizes are losing ground in general estimation. They are now considered as inferior at a distance, pretty as they may appear on close inspection. The new idea is to set the stones in rows, so they constitute geometric, or at least conventional, designs, which exhibit the diamonds to the best advantage, show off from afar as well as near. The reader need not be told that far more care and careful manipulation is necessary to create a jewel of this description. The stones must be matched in size and color, as the slightest variation is immediately noticeable, whereas in the clustered arrangement diamonds of all sorts and shapes may be crowded together with more or less artistic effect.—Jewelers' Weekly.

R. S. Shapton's team from Charlevoix drew 3,264 feet of green hardwood lumber from Vance's mill (5 miles) to the dock at East Jordan one day last week. This is a big load to draw, but we do it—Enterprise.

A. D. Cruickshank had a letter this week from Rev. G. Daniels, a former pastor of the M. E. church here, now in Denver, Colo., stating that his daughter Maud died recently of diphtheria, complicated with the grippe and pneumonia.

A very enjoyable time was had at Miss Winnie Bartholomew's birthday party, at the opera hall last Saturday evening. About 35 young people were present. Miss Winnie was presented during the evening with a pair of elegant pearl opera glasses.

The Inwood hotel proprietor has completed this week for G. W. Cronter, Grand Master, his report to the Grand Lodge of Michigan, I. O. O. F., which meets at Ionia next week. The hotels and restaurants, five of which are a tabulated statement of the contributions of all lodges in the state to the aid of other lodges, and to the relief of suffering Odd Fellows at Johnstown. To the latter fund the contributions aggregated $1,922.55. The report shows the Order generally to be in a prosperous condition.

Local politics have been at a white heat during the past week. The republican pressure against the JOURNAL has been so fierce that on Saturday the usually steady, sober Albert E. Mason was persuaded to withdraw his patronage,—he didn't want anything more to do with us, he said. From a careful search of our books we find that Mr. Mason's patronage since the JOURNAL was established,—nearly seven years,—has amounted to just $30.65, nearly every cent of which has been taken in trade out of the store. On the other hand, we have paid Mr. Mason in cash for goods, and for work, to his advertising, upwards of $50 in the last year, and nearly as much other years. His store is a very convenient place for us to trade, but we shall be compelled to forego the pleasure, under his instructions.

Railroad Notes.

H. B. Hedges, the civil engineer who has charge of the C. & W. M. surveying gang, now at work near Central Lake, informed Tax Herald last Friday that it was still doubtful as to the route the road will take. His orders are, he says, to find the most feasible route to Charlevoix, and while much will depend upon his report, there are other things to take into consideration. The work through the Intermediate village will be heavy but not sufficiently so to discourage a road, while the curvature will be extremely slight. The route between the lake and bay will, on some accounts, be an excellent one, as it shortens the distance considerably, and following as it does the water front, the grade will be comparatively easy. But, to offset this, the road will not have the territory to draw from that it would have on this side of Torch lake. Elk Rapids will make a determined fight for the line, and will prove a most formidable opponent to the towns in the valley, as the amount of business she can guarantee a railroad will be considerably in excess of what Bellaire can possibly furnish. On the other hand, the county seat is alive to the importance of securing the C. & W. M., for she fully realizes that if this line winds its way northward on the opposite side of the lake, then the "jig is up" with Bellaire, for the prospects of Antrim county ever getting another through line will be so slim that only the most visionary will condescend to give the matter a thought. Yes, Bellaire wants the road, if anything, even more than Elk Rapids, and, as regards a suitable bonus, she will probably do the handsome thing, for the road also must have or ever afterwards "go afoot," but it will be comparatively easy for Elk Rapids to tap the main line at Williamsburg with a "spur," in event of the valley route being chosen.—Mancelona Herald.

D. Ward arrived in town Monday of last week, and went away on Saturday, spending most of the intervening time at his camps. While at camp, he was visited by the president of the East Jordan Lumber Company, the president of the East Jordan Hoop Company and Mr. Nichols, of Charlevoix, who are interested in having Mr. Ward's railroad extended to East Jordan.—Alba Cor. Mancelona Herald.

A Model Farm.

Our Inwood reporter furnishes the following concerning the enterprise of Mr. O. D. Wood, of Charlevoix:

A few years ago Mr. Wood bought about seven hundred acres of land in the town of Banks, for a stock farm, and has about four hundred acres of the land under cultivation, with the stumps all out so that nearly everything can be done with the latest improved machinery. The surface is rolling, and the soil a clay loam, and never fails to raise the best crops. It is stocked with 150 horses, 35 head of cattle, and about 100 sheep. Every animal is stabled, requiring two large barns to give shelter for all. In one barn is the corner of his barn yard is a spring of pure water, available at all times for the stock, and dispensing with pumps and wind-mills.

Mr. Wood has just completed one of the best farm houses in northern Michigan. It is an upright with two large wings, and finished in hardwood. The house is heated with an improved furnace. The lower part of the house can be thrown open into one large room by folding doors.

The farm is operated and managed by Mr. Wood's brother.

Historical Society.

The program at the meeting last week included the following: "Piano solo, 'Faded Leaves,' Luna Washburn; select reading, 'Divided,' Maggie Green; paper of the evening, 'Literature after the Declaration of Independence, Josie Litzan; a select reading, 'Knickerbocker,' Mrs. H. M. Enos; vocal duet, 'Good Night Beloved,' Florence and Katie Smith; select reading, 'Tom's Strategy' Miss Cochran, and by request the Misses Smith repeated their duet. The meeting this week will be with Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Green. Paper by Geo. Martin Cartney on "American Journalism."

Shall We Suspend?

Three republicans have declared a boycott on the JOURNAL on account of recent issues, and we have private information that others intend to do so soon. Would these gentlemen come back to the time when there was but one paper in Charlevoix, and no opportunity to get a hearing in opposition to the editor's own opinions?

LETTER FROM M. J. STOCKMAN

Trip of the "Lillie C." of Port Orange up Indian River.

Our party consisting of E. Carpenter, R. A. Emrey, D. S. Way and M. J. Stockman, left Port Orange in the fast sailing yacht Lillie C. at 9 o'clock a. m. Tuesday, Jan. 21st, on route for Indian River and Lake Worth. At 11 o'clock we crossed Mosquito inlet with the tide running out so strong that at one time we were in danger of being carried out to sea. But a breeze springing up enabled us to cross in good shape. This inlet is a break in the beach ridge about half a mile in width, through which the ocean tide pours in and fills the Halifax and Hillsborough rivers, running north up the Halifax and south up the Hillsborough. The tide here rises about three feet with about 9 feet of water over the bar at high tide. The channel changes considerably at times, owing to the south-east and north east gales which frequently occur along this coast. The Hillsborough river extends south over thirty miles and for the first fifteen miles is about a mile in width, but considerably filled with sand bars, marsh and mangrove islands, through which the channel is somewhat crooked. The southern half of the river is nearly three miles in width, free from islands, but shallow. This is called the Lagoon. A few miles from the inlet on the west shore of the river is the town of New Smyrnia, of about three hundred inhabitants and has railroad connections with Orange City and the St. John's River. At this place (the wind being light and the tide against us) we stop for dinner for an hour, when we again are under way, although we do not proceed very fast owing, to the wind being light, and which, after a few miles, left us entirely so that we were obliged to come to anchor or drift back with the tide. We, however, did not lay at anchor long before we have up and pulled to a shell bank close by, where Dan, who constituted himself our steward, prepared our supper which we ate with a relish. Soon after supper we take the poles and pole up the river several miles until 8 o'clock, when we pitch tent for the night. This is done by placing a pole on two crotches at each end of the boat, drawing a tent cloth over this and buttoning down at the sides and ends which makes a comfortable tent in which to sleep. These tents are standing our blankets we lay down to take a few hours rest, —but our rest is of short duration. The mosquitoes which were quite plenty, in fact too much so, broke up of our rest, and Dan and Ranny got up and poled the boat along the channel as long as they could find a channel stake to guide them, by which time it has become somewhat cooler, so that the mosquitoes gave us a rest. We got a good sleep until morning (Wednesday, 22d). This morning we were up as soon as it is light enough to see. Wind blowing strong from the north. Seeing a shanty a short distance ahead and a cracker barrel on the bank, we went ashore to replenish our water jugs. The old cracker who lived here made his living catching turtles of which he had quite a number in a pen built in the river for that purpose. These turtles are captured with grill nets similar to those used by our Lake Michigan fishermen with the exception that the twine is much stronger and the mesh of the net much larger. The net we saw drying had eleven inch mesh. The old cracker said the turtles did not show any sense, but would come along and put one fluke through the mesh of the net when instead of taking it out and backing off from it, in, and in this manner he found them when he went to the nets. This place he told us was called Ship-yard, but why it should be so called was a question. About all the dry land in sight was that upon which stood his shanty. After replenishing our water jugs and putting a reef in the sail we are off again, in a short time passing Turtle Mound situated on the east or peninsula bank of the river. This mound is composed of oyster and clam shells and was evidently built by a race of people who inhabited this portion of the country hundreds of years before America was discovered. This mound is at least 40 feet in height and covers nearly, if not quite, half an acre of ground. One can hardly realize that this mound was built by human hands, but in digging into the side of it evidences are found which clearly indicate the work of human hands, such as pieces of broken pottery and the shells being chipped in opening. This, if there were no other evidences would lead one to believe that such was the fact. A short distance farther we pass Eldora. This place looks as though it needed some enterprising Yankee to take hold of its surroundings and give it a boom,—from appearances it looked quite deserted. We next pass Oak Hill but the distance being so great we were unable to pass judgment on the place. We now enter an artificial channel connecting the Hillsborough River with the Lagoon. This channel has been dredged for a distance of nearly a mile. Soon after we pass Shilo, but as in the case of Oak Hill distance is too great to judge much as to how the place looks.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

The Sentinel's Accuracy Questioned.

EDITOR JOURNAL.—Permit me to reply to an article in the Sentinel in relation to the employment of a janitor and engineer for the Charlevoix fire department.

What are the facts?

The Sentinel states that I testified before the village council to having run an old stationary engine in Canada some ten years ago.

I stated that I had been employed in the capacity of engineer one year constant, and afterwards two years part of the time, a short time before coming here; and also, if required, I could furnish them with references as to my ability. And further, as to the examination referred to by the Sentinel, there was not a question asked me as to what I knew or did not know about the business.

The cause of my rejection, I believe, to be a matter of spite in regard to other matters by one or two members of said council, and because I do not belong to their party or ring.

These are the facts, and I challenge contradiction.

PRINTERS' INK.

A JOURNAL FOR ADVERTISERS

PRINTERS' INK is just what it purports to be, a journal for advertisers. It is issued on the 15th and 30th days of each month, and is the representative journal of the advertising interests of America exclusively. It tells the industry and business of advertising in plain, unpretentious sentences how, when, and where to advertise; how to make advertisements pay; how to display one's wares advantageously; what mediums are best for certain classes of business; what it should cost; what it should properly cost; what it ought to cost; and, finally, what it does cost. Perhaps the special feature of PRINTERS' INK is its exposures of fraudulent advertising mediums. It has exposed the rottenness of the business in its earlier days, and has kept pretty well up with the procession ever since. It has exposed many fakes, and has saved many times its cost to many a subscriber. It has no quarrel with any honest medium, but it does not hesitate to expose the fraudulent. It has fearless, outspoken editorials upon all matters pertaining to advertising, which are worth the price of the paper to any man who is in any way interested in the business. Advertising is an art, and PRINTERS' INK is read by the best artists in the business. If you are interested in advertising, you should subscribe. Sample copy free. Price, $1 a year. Address, GEO. P. ROWELL & CO'S Newspaper Advertising Bureau (10 Spruce St.), New York.

BABY.

Before the cheerful fire to-night,
My wife and I are sitting,
We softly talk of days gone by,
And as our hearts, each memories lie
Of baby.

Our treasure was a boy, of course,
And such a sturdy youngster,
With hair of gold, and eyes of blue,
And six white teeth, so straight and true,
Had baby.

His chubby hands, all dimpled, too,
And fingers, always itching,
To pull our hair and poke our eyes,
And other tricks, to our surprise,
Did baby.

He made my wife a slave all day
Keeping him out of mischief
He'd pick up pins and dirt, you see,
And put them in his mouth, would he,
Would baby.

And then, at night, when I came home,
He'd crow and smile to see me,
He'd pick my pockets, do his best
To grab my pipe (the little pest)
That baby.

At bedtime, too, he'd vex us sore,
With all his restless antics,
And when we thought he was asleep,
Around the door, who then would peep,
But baby.

And so to-night we sit and think,
Of baby's ways and doings,
And of those hands and voice, now still,
And through our hearts such memories thrill,
Oh! baby.

But, hark! From out the stillness comes,
A voice so soft and cooing,
That rascal, there, has just awoke,
And smiling too, a master stroke,
Our baby.

THAT STRANGE ANIMAL.

North and east of Fort Davis, Tex., stretching far away to that strip of nondescript soil, known as "No Man's Land," is the remnant of the so called Great American desert, designated on the maps and in the geographies as "Llano Estacado," or Staked Plain. The name desert is a misnomer, for the Llano Estacado is not a desert, but rather a well watered, grassy plain, covered with hay and verdure, the natural home and refuge at the present time of nearly all the large game animals of the southwestern portion of the United States.

All the buffaloes we have in the country, except a scattered pair here and there, and one mountain bison of the Yellowstone park, are to be found homelessly wandering over the staked plain. Mustangs, wild and untamed, gallop with unshod hoofs over the soft, velvety carpet, and antelope, the most dainty of all feeders, seek here the delicate wild clover and maiden flowers which are found nowhere else in such abundance as upon this wild and unsettled tract.

A Texas cowboy, in search of stray cattle, came in from the plains and reported that, while chasing a wild and untamable steer into an entirely unknown region, where perhaps no human foot save that of an Indian had ever trod before, he saw in the dim distance a large, bulky and unwieldly creature, which he at first took to be a buffalo. Yet it could not be a buffalo, for it was too large and too slender of build, and covered the ground in a long, loping sort of stride, whereas a buffalo, when put to his speed, usually adopts a short gallop, very much like a range steer.

Big enough for an elephant, and yet as slender as a giraffe, what in the name of wonder can the creature be? thought the cowboy. His jaded mustang was too weary and the day too far gone for him to undertake a chase to the death, so the cow puncher turned his tracks and trotted slowly back to the round up camp, where he told his yarn to his comrades, with due exaggeration as to the size, speed and build of the strange animal he had encountered.

"Now come, Bill," exclaimed one, "we shed the least lock like, anyway"

"Why, jest as I tell yer," answered Bill. "He was a great big brute, with two story legs, a long neck, a fat, ugly trot, an' a hump on his back big as a hogshead."

"Oh, I see," said another. "Nothing but a stray buffler, cause he had a hump on his back. Yer got fooled that time, Bill; and fooled in the bargain by an old buffler bull. Yer ought to know better, bun."

"Tell yer, Jim, I'm not fooled," exclaimed Bill, hotly. "Don't I know a buffler bull when I see one? That feller was no buffler, nor no steer, an' I'll bet a ninety foot lariat he don't belong to this country, either."

The others were quite interested now, for they knew Bill Yerkes was likely to be correct when he was so earnest about it, and an agreement was made that rounding up, cutting out and branding should be suspended a couple of days, while the whole party went on a chase across the country in search of the wonderful animal seen by their comrade that day.

Next morning, before day, four stout, sturdy fellows were in the saddle and moving westward, leaving one of their number behind as guard for the camp. Their mounts were beautiful. The mustangs they bestrode had been captured while mere ponies from the wild herds that yet, in limited numbers, course over the great plain, except the one ridden by Yerkes, and this animal was a gaunt, raw boned specimen, raised somewhere in the southeastern part of the state and brought to the range by Yerkes himself, who seemed very fond of the brute. The four men separated, striking off in different directions, like an open fan, and agreeing to meet that night for camp on a branch of the south fork of the Canadian, which was nearly dry at this time of the year. About sunset all had arrived at the rendezvous except Bill Yerkes. While the others were sitting around the camp fire, about 9 o'clock, feasting upon wild turkey which had been shot from a tree near by, their missing comrade rode up.

His three himself from his horse, removed the saddle, watered and picketed his animal and then joined the others.

"Wal, fellers," he exclaimed, "I have spotted the darned cuss again."

"The deuse you have," ejaculated the others, with great interest.

"Yes, I found him about six miles above here at sundown, and jest as I was about to give up the hunt."

"Well, what is it?" exclaimed the three in one breath.

"Darned if I know," said Yerkes. "It was too dark to see clearly, and then the varmint cuss sighted me as soon as I did him and off he started toward the setting sun like a locomotive. But I've got his bearings, and I'll catch that skunk to-morrow or give up cow punching and range riding for good."

The second morning the four were in the saddle by light and traveling up stream until a grass overgrown bottom, interspersed with scrub oak and pecan trees, was reached.

"Here," said Yerkes, "is where I saw the fellow last night."

"And here," said Dick Pepper, "are the hoster's tracks"—at the same time leaping from his mustang and examining several large hoofprints in the muddy portion of the creek bottom.

"Wal, that beats me," remarked Bob Newhall, the fourth of the party. "What you take them tracks to be, Yerkes? No such steer as that in the whole kentry as I knows of."

"Tain't no steer," responded the other. "Darned if I can size the creature up, but let's keep after him an' we'll soon find out, or I'm no preacher."

Out over the prairie rode the four men, following as best they could the trail of this strange animal, but all signs were soon lost in the sand and gravel, as the country had now assumed a barren, desolate appearance, covered with hillocks of sand, and almost as flat as a billiard table as far as the eye could see. About noon a speck on the horizon was sighted, and toward this atom the quartet rode steadily, gaining rapidly, and very soon coming so far within range as to outlive the object.

"That's the fellow an' no snakes," shouted Yerkes, hardly able to curb his excitement.

Sure enough. There in the distance, far ahead, was a strange, ungainly object that bore no resemblance to any living creature born or bred on this continent. With a rapid, sideling, cumbersome gait he easily kept beyond the fleetest mustang until darkness almost hid his ugly form from view; but still the four horsemen were doing their utmost to catch up, with Yerkes a long advantage in the lead and evidently determined to solve the mystery at any cost or kill his horse. The last his three comrades saw of him Yerkes was going at a 2:40 gait, his long Mexican lariat trailing behind and his rawboned steed doing his level best to bring his master alongside the stranger they were pursuing. The others soon gave up and went into a dry camp amid a bunch of cottonwoods for a few hours, where they had to dig in the sand for water.

As darkness crew around him poor Yerkes almost gave up in despair. His tired mustang protested in a dumb out of way against such treatment, but still the relentless rider, and forced himself and steed to such extremities that at last, when the darkness had actually closed in upon the whole flat plain, the man was compelled to admit that he was no wiser than the day before regarding the identity of the creature he was chasing.

As he slackened his speed to think over the situation his quarry also reduced his gait. A bright moon now came sailing up from the ocean of sand, and just at this moment the chase passed before the great red ball, so that his form was clearly outlined against the bright background.

"The devil!" ejaculated Yerkes. "Darn my skin if I don't believe it's a camel. Well, if I can't catch him I'll round him up, anyhow; so here goes."

Making a long detour, he managed gradually to get beyond the animal and turned him in his course, so that pretty soon both pursuer and pursued were traveling directly back over the course they had come. But the pace was slow this time, as the mustang began to show evident signs of pegging out, and the man was very tired and weary, too. Observing that his game was now resting, also, or rather nibbling the scant herbage and drifting slowly eastward, the cowboy quickly leaped from his seat, removed saddle blanket and bridle, lariated his steed, who commenced grazing at once, took a good chew of tobacco, and, resting his head on the saddle, turned over in a pile of soft, loose sand and was soon sound asleep.

When he awoke some hours later he found the moon nearly overhead and his horse still quietly nibbling the few spears of grass peeping above the sandy soil. Nowhere in sight was the strange animal he had followed. Saddling and mounting he rode here and there in search of the brute, but the latter had vanished without sight, sound or sign to follow.

Utterly and thoroughly disgusted, Yerkes started on the back trail, at the same time muttering startling exclamations against the strange thing that had led him a will goose chase to no purpose for two days and a night over the plains. Riding on and on in that still night, not a sound save the coyote bark or a wolf howl to break the intense silence, the man would talk and reason with his horse upon the mysterious object that had befaller him. Toward morning Venus came sailing majestically up from the east, and the moon, still shining brightly, lit up the vast plain, reflecting back the sparkling fires of and like the water of the ocean sparkles and dances under her silvery beams.

Just then a faint noise came floating from far ahead. Yerkes pulled up instantly and both horse and rider bent their ears to listen. Louder and louder it grew until the beating of hoofs could be heard, and presently, too, the sound of men's voices hallooing and shouting. Somebody was chasing something, of this there could be no mistake. Then in the dim light a black object hove in sight with three horsemen in hot pursuit.

"That's my game, by gosh," said Yerkes to himself with great excitement, "and darn my hide but I'll have him now."

The man quickly unslung his long Mexican lariat (he was a fine ropper), and putting his horse encouragingly, made ready to cast the moment he was within proper distance. On came the big game with a rush, making wonderful long strides with his tremendous legs, and not two hundred yards behind were the three cowboys, urging their mustangs at the top of their speed, yelling like mad. Yerkes got his lariat in position, and then began that long graceful swing, with the magic circle opening like an oval, that only the practical arm can give to the rope. Straight at the man rushed the brute, but, evidently discovering him when too late, the latter made a bold swerve to the left, as if to pass by him. Galloping alongside for a moment, the rope swung in the air, and then, awish, it darted, settling snugly about the long, hoop like neck.

In true cowboy style, as if handling a steer, Yerkes kept up his pace and gradually got into position for throwing the animal. This process is as follows: When the noose is around the head, horns or neck, the next movement is to arrange the line on the further side of the animal, both pursuer and pursued going at full speed, so that it is about the height of the legs. Then, by suddenly stopping the pony, who plants his forelegs firmly to withstand the shock, by a quick, sudden jerk the steer's legs are pulled from under him, and over he rolls in the dust. This is precisely the manner in which Yerkes treated his strange captive.

When everything was ready and the line in position he pulled his horse up suddenly and jerked the strange brute's legs from under him. The mighty body of the latter tumbled heavily all in a heap, but there was a sharp, ugly snap as if something had cracked. In a word, the fall had broken its neck.

In a few minutes the four men were grouped together standing over the carcass and eying it in perfect wonder.

"Wall, I'll be shot for a tenderfoot, but that beats me," said Jim Pepper.

"Where in the devil did he come from, jest that here no resemblance to any living creature born or bred on this continent. With a rapid, sideling, cumbersome gait he easily kept beyond the fleetest mustang until darkness almost hid his ugly form from view; but still the four horsemen were doing their utmost to catch up, with Yerkes a long advantage in the lead and evidently determined to solve the mystery at any cost or kill his horse. "Darned if I know," said Yerkes. "It was too dark to see clearly, and then the varmint cuss sighted me as soon as I did him and off he started toward the setting sun like a locomotive. But I've got his bearings, and I'll catch that skunk to-morrow or give up cow punching and range riding for good."

The second morning the four were in the saddle by light and traveling up stream until a grass overgrown bottom, interspersed with scrub oak and pecan trees, was reached.

"Here," said Yerkes, "is where I saw the fellow last night."

"And here," said Dick Pepper, "are the hoster's tracks"—at the same time leaping from his mustang and examining several large hoofprints in the muddy portion of the creek bottom.

"Wal, that beats me," remarked Bob Newhall, the fourth of the party. "What you take them tracks to be, Yerkes? No such steer as that in the whole kentry as I knows of."

"Tain't no steer," responded the other. "Darned if I can size the creature up, but let's keep after him an' we'll soon find out, or I'm no preacher."

Out over the prairie rode the four men, following as best they could the trail of this strange animal, but all signs were soon lost in the sand and gravel, as the country had now assumed a barren, desolate appearance, covered with hillocks of sand, and almost as flat as a billiard table as far as the eye could see. About noon a speck on the horizon was sighted, and toward this atom the quartet rode steadily, gaining rapidly, and very soon coming so far within range as to outlive the object.

"That's the fellow an' no snakes," shouted Yerkes, hardly able to curb his excitement.

Sure enough. There in the distance, far ahead, was a strange, ungainly object that bore no resemblance to any living creature born or bred on this continent. With a rapid, sideling, cumbersome gait he easily kept beyond the fleetest mustang until darkness almost hid his ugly form from view; but still the four horsemen were doing their utmost to catch up, with Yerkes a long advantage in the lead and evidently determined to solve the mystery at any cost or kill his horse. The last his three comrades saw of him Yerkes was going at a 2:40 gait, his long Mexican lariat trailing behind and his rawboned steed doing his level best to bring his master alongside the stranger they were pursuing. The others soon gave up and went into a dry camp amid a bunch of cottonwoods for a few hours, where they had to dig in the sand for water.

As darkness crew around him poor Yerkes almost gave up in despair. His tired mustang protested in a dumb out of way against such treatment, but still the relentless rider, and forced himself and steed to such extremities that at last, when the darkness had actually closed in upon the whole flat plain, the man was compelled to admit that he was no wiser than the day before regarding the identity of the creature he was chasing.

As he slackened his speed to think over the situation his quarry also reduced his gait. A bright moon now came sailing up from the ocean of sand, and just at this moment the chase passed before the great red ball, so that his form was clearly outlined against the bright background.

"The devil!" ejaculated Yerkes. "Darn my skin if I don't believe it's a camel. Well, if I can't catch him I'll round him up, anyhow; so here goes."

Making a long detour, he managed gradually to get beyond the animal and turned him in his course, so that pretty soon both pursuer and pursued were traveling directly back over the course they had come. But the pace was slow this time, as the mustang began to show evident signs of pegging out, and the man was very tired and weary, too. Observing that his game was now resting, also, or rather nibbling the scant herbage and drifting slowly eastward, the cowboy quickly leaped from his seat, removed saddle blanket and bridle, lariated his steed, who commenced grazing at once, took a good chew of tobacco, and, resting his head on the saddle, turned over in a pile of soft, loose sand and was soon sound asleep.

When he awoke some hours later he found the moon nearly overhead and his horse still quietly nibbling the few spears of grass peeping above the sandy soil. Nowhere in sight was the strange animal he had followed. Saddling and mounting he rode here and there in search of the brute, but the latter had vanished without sight, sound or sign to follow.

Utterly and thoroughly disgusted, Yerkes started on the back trail, at the same time muttering startling exclamations against the strange thing that had led him a will goose chase to no purpose for two days and a night over the plains. Riding on and on in that still night, not a sound save the coyote bark or a wolf howl to break the intense silence, the man would talk and reason with his horse upon the mysterious object that had befallen him. Toward morning Venus came sailing majestically up from the east, and the moon, still shining brightly, lit up the vast plain, reflecting back the sparkling fires of and like the water of the ocean sparkles and dances under her silvery beams.

Just then a faint noise came floating from far ahead. Yerkes pulled up instantly and both horse and rider bent their ears to listen. Louder and louder it grew until the beating of hoofs could be heard, and presently, too, the sound of men's voices hallooing and shouting. Somebody was chasing something, of this there could be no mistake. Then in the dim light a black object hove in sight with three horsemen in hot pursuit.

"That's my game, by gosh," said Yerkes to himself with great excitement, "and darn my hide but I'll have him now."

The man quickly unslung his long Mexican lariat (he was a fine ropper), and putting his horse encouragingly, made ready to cast the moment he was within

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE
TO THE North American Review.

Arrangements have been made for the coming year which will maintain for the Review its unrivalled position among periodicals, and render it essential to every reader in America who desires to keep abreast of the times. From month to month topics of commanding interest in every field of human thought and action will be treated of in its pages by representative writers, whose words and names carry authority with them.

The forthcoming volume will be signalized by the discussion of questions of high public interest by the foremost of men of the time, notably by a controversy on Free Trade and Protection in their bearing upon the development of American Industry and Commerce, between the two most famous living statesmen of England and America,

The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE,
AND
Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE.

This discussion, embracing the most important contributions ever made to an American periodical, will begin in the January number.

It is a significant fact—as showing the unparalleled popularity and usefulness of this periodical, and its wide influence upon public opinion—that more than one-half of THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW is greater than that of all other American and English Reviews combined.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

[The JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns in which it is not represented, to give us all the news in as brief and concise form as possible. Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach Charlevoix by later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality.]

Pleasant Valley.

FEB. 18.—The following notice copied from the Boyne Citizen will relieve the "suspense" of the Wilson correspondent: "Married—At the Commercial House on the 24th ult., Alva Kuhns, of Boyne, to Miss Elcie Dorrance, of Indian River. Rev. J. Burge officiated."

By the way, Wilson, what are the symptoms of that new disease—"the inevitable"—which, is afflicting the Afton janitor? Is it catching, and have we all got to have it, who survive the gripe?

Capt. Haynes has returned from a trip to Brutus where he has been to visit his daughter, Mrs. James Watts who is dangerously ill with the grip.

Chas. Ward, sick with bronchitis and pleurisy, is unable to work, and is under the care of Dr. Kay of Boyne City.

Saturday, the 15th inst., Silas Deming came near getting a broken leg while loading logs at Beach's camp. No bones were broken, but he will be confined to the house for some time.

Miss Satie Newville of Boyne City, and Misses Arlos Burdick and Edna Newville visited Miss Grace Newville last Saturday, in honor of her eleventh birthday.

Rev. J. Burge filled his regular appointment at the school house last Sunday.

Frank Newville'and family visited at J. A. Newville's Sunday.

At the meeting of the P. V. E. club held Friday evening, Feb. 7. The paper was read by the editor Van R. Newville and Mrs. W. C. Burdick. Perley V. Burdick was elected editor for this month.

Inwood.

O. D. Hilton put up his ice last week, securing a good quality at Mc Geagh's mill-pond.

Albert O'Brian is home from East Jordan, sick with the grippe.

Amanda Stafford broke his leg last week while riding on a lumber sleigh. He is reported as doing well.

Last Saturday night the Catholics of Atwood had a social for the benefit of their church. There was a good attendance.

Frank Pearl attended court at Boyne City this week, as deputy sheriff.

Rev. Mr. Hayne will preach at Hilton school house next Sunday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Hosea Moore died of cancer on the 18th. He went to Detroit last fall and had it cut out, but after his return it grew larger than ever. Consumption hastened his death. He leaves a wife, three daughters, and three brothers to mourn.

Miss Almeda Hardy died Sunday of heart disease, aged 71 years. She was a sister of Miss Lo Hardy, Mrs. A. B. Noyes, and Mrs. Elmer Clark. The two unmarried sisters had lived together alone many years.

Advance.

FEB. 18.—The lack of snow makes it rather discouraging for lumbermen, but they still keep hauling the logs to the mill as fast as possible.

Platte's mill is running part of the time and is making some very nice lumber, and since the improvements that were made some time ago it has greater power than before.

F. E. Miller and family left here for Kansas City, the 8th inst. His friends all wish him success in his new home.

Mr. L. E. Phillips is sick with quinsy.

Geo. E. Rogers has been quite sick for the past week, but is now on the gain.

We understand that John H. Backenstose intends moving onto the farm lately owned by F. E. Miller where he will continue his practice of (school) law.

Now and then a horse and cutter or double team is seen on the lake, but the ice is not safe yet. About ten days ago L. E. Phillips attempted to cross on the ice from Boyne City to Advance and his team broke through and came very near drowning.

In last week's JOURNAL the Eveline correspondent stated that F. E. Miller and family were down with la grippe. Mr. Miller and family left here the 8th and at that time were all well. Stick to your own locality Bro. Eveline, and you will be all right. We have noticed on several occasions that when you wander from your own hunting grounds you are apt to get things mixed.

Burgess.

FEB. 18.—Thomas Sunderland's child, who is living with its grandfather, Alick Ross, is very sick with inflammation of the bowels.

John Harris, who returned home some time ago from Big Rapids where he had been for medical treatment but was not benefited any, is getting better.

Miss Lizzie Willis, who has been home for the past few weeks on a visit, returns to Cheboygan the middle of the week.

Mrs. Frank Kane and Mrs. I. S. Webster were visiting friends in Bay Sunday.

The dance at Newson's last Friday was a success in every respect. A large attendance and a very enjoyable time.

Miss Ella Adams closes her term of school this week Friday, in Maple Grove district, where she has taught for three terms. She is one of the most successful teachers in the county, and the scholars all express regret at parting with her.

District No. 4 appears to be in a sad muddle and some one must be to blame for it.

Wilson.

FEB. 18.—Beautiful weather but not much snow.

S. P. Smith, Esq., was a guest of his son F. L. on Monday last.

Mabel Smith is stopping at J. R. Cooper's.

Two gentlemen from Ionia called on D. Ruch on Thursday last.

Saint's meeting at Meb. Healey's on Saturday evening.

THE WICKER WORKERS.

THE BUSINESS OF WEAVING TWIGS INTO THINGS OF UTILITY.

An Ancient Art in Which the Britons and Romans Were Adepts—The Process as It Is Carried on in a Modern Shop—Not a Very Lucrative Calling.

Wicker work is world wide and of ancient date. The Hindoos found wicker boats covered with skins in use among the ancient natives of Britain. Round boats of wicker work, covered with bitumen or skins, were used on the Tigris and Euphrates in the time of Herodotus, and similar boats are still used there. In India boats of a similar form and construction are still in use for crossing rapid rivers; they are made of bamboo and skins and require only a few hours' labor.

The ancient Britons manufactured wicker vessels with extraordinary skill and ingenuity. Their costly and elegant baskets are mentioned by Juvenal in speaking of the extravagance of the Romans in his time. The natives of South America made baskets of rushes so closely woven as to hold liquids. The natives of Tasmania wove similar water-tight vessels of leaves.

The Kaffers and Hottentots are skilled in weaving the roots of certain plants. Shields, in ancient times, were constructed of wicker work, plain or covered with hides, and are still in use among certain savage tribes. Wicker work is now largely used for the bodies of light carriages. In different parts of the world, houses, huts, gates, fences, sledges and shoes are formed by this ancient and universal art.

In the construction of the rudest kind of a basket the twigs or rods are assorted according to their size and use and left considerably longer than the work to be woven. They are laid on the floor in pairs parallel to each other and at small intervals apart and in the direction of the long diameter of the basket. Two large rows are laid across the parallel rods with their thick ends toward the workman, who is to put his foot on them and weave them one at a time alternately over and under those first laid down, confining them in their places. This forms the foundation of the basket and is technically called the slat or slate.

Then the long end of one of these two rods is woven over and under the pairs of short ends all round the bottom till the whole is woven in. The same is done with the other rod, and then additional long ones are woven in till the bottom of the basket is of sufficient size. The sides are formed by sharpening the large ends of enough stout rods to form the ribs, and plaiting or forcing the sharpened ends into the bottom of the basket from the circumference toward the center, then raising the rods in the direction the sides of the basket are to have and weaving other rods between them till the basket is of the required depth. The brim is formed by bending down and fastening the perpendicular sides of the ribs, whereby the whole is firmly and compactly united. A handle is fitted to the basket by forcing two or three sharpened rods of the right length down the weaving of the sides close to each other and pinning them fast about two inches below the brim, so that the handle may retain its position when completed. The ends of the rods are then bound or plaited in any way the workmen may choose.

There are twelve firms of basket makers in Detroit, employing about 100 persons, mostly men and boys. It is stated that a girl is employed in this business, and there are no women. The reason assigned is that the only thing they could do would be to plat, and there is so much bending over in the work. Besides this the cutting of splints and lands is very heavy work. The men and boys work for two hours a day when they do not work by the piece, and the average wages are from $5 to $10 per week. Piece workers sometimes average $18 per week, but that is when the basket maker is especially skillful.

The basket principally manufactured in the city is the splint, the splints being shavings cut from Norway pine and in a large variety of sizes, some covered and some open, from a quart to a bushel and a half. The largest sized covered baskets are used extensively by florists in which to convey cut flowers, and are packed in the delivery wagons. Traveling lunch baskets are made of the Norway splints, and are used generally for the festive picnic and for traveling purposes where a cold lunch is the comfortable and economical idea. The splints are woven in diamond shape, and the market baskets of this material are called diamond baskets.

Other market baskets are made of the osier willow, the osiers coming from various parts of Michigan. Of the willow baskets, there is the clothes hamper, the clothes basket and open and covered market baskets varying in size, but all having a special form.

The willows are prepared by the boiling process for the purpose of peeling them. They are then allowed to cool, and are tied up in bundles for future use. They are split as they are needed for use by passing them through a small knife, set in a block. A great many wild willows are used, but only in rough baskets, such as open market baskets. Cultivated willows are used for the finer qualities of baskets and willow chairs and cradles, and the tops of children's carriages. The willows are grown in swampy places that cannot be utilized for other purposes without draining.

The fancy baskets are principally imported from Germany. The genuine stained Indian basket is made on Waipole Island, but there is not near so many made on that island as heretofore. The wood, principally black ash and latterly rock elm, has been exhausted, and they have got to get their material in Canada. Moore's market baskets are made by the Indians.

The general condition of those who are engaged in the manufacture of baskets and wicker work generally is one of fair living, with close economy, since the business is one which is not of a nature to develop great establishments and concentrate great wealth.—Detroit News.

THAT COPPER MINE SWINDLE.

The Electrical Companies Want Free Copper.

The electric companies in the United States want copper ingots, bars, plates, rods and wires placed on the free list. At the last public hearing of the committee of ways and means on tariff questions Mr. George M. Phelps, of New York, representing the New York National Electrical Lighting association, urged that the copper mines of the United States are the largest and finest in the world; that copper can be produced more cheaply here than anywhere else, and that prices are artificially maintained within the boundaries of the country by a combination of the mine owners, which nobody can deny.

The duty on copper in any of the forms above mentioned is four cents a pound. It is a curious thing that while we export copper in large quantities to Europe, the price is always higher in this country. The Calumet and Hecla mine in Michigan has paid shareholders over $30,000,000 dividends on a capital of $5,500,000 since 1868. Therefore, these cannot require any protection.

The existence of a trust is almost self evident. Copper can be raised and refined at the Lake Superior mines at a cost not exceeding four cents.

It can be landed in New York city free at 6 cents. Yet the quotation for it in the New York Metal Exchange on Jan. 16, 1890, was 14¼ cents a pound. On the same day the spot price of copper in London was £50 per ton, or approximately 11 cents a pound. So that, after paying costs of freight and insurance to London, the mine owners of Michigan were still able to sell it there 3¼ cents a pound cheaper than in New York. It only needs to be pointed out that this 4 cents differential or thereabouts has prevailed against this country since 1879, and that 4 cents a pound is the amount of the duty, so that the American consumer has to pay the mine owner this amount more than the foreigner. No wonder the foreigner can undersell us in outside markets!

Rev. Charles H. Spurgeon.

The labors of Mr. Spurgeon have doubtless been greater in the peculiar field he has chosen than those of any other modern evangelical preacher. For a number of years he has conducted a Pastors' college, where young men are equipped for the ministry. Several hundred of his pupils have been sent out to other fields, some in city pulpits, some to city missions and others to the foreign field. The average attendance at his college is about 300. Another institution formed and supported by his energies is the system of orphanages, where several hundred boys and girls are grouped in little families and trained to some useful business. The orphans are taken in without regard to creed. As a writer in the great English Baptist has become known to the many millions who could not hear him preach. His "Treasury of David" and "John Plowman's Talk" are among the best known of his productions. The former work is a commentary on the Psalms and has a permanent value. His lectures and sermons have been published and widely circulated, and in 1855 he began the editorship of a monthly religious magazine called The Sword and Trowel, which (at 32) he conducted by him.

The great enemy of Mr. Spurgeon's peace for some years has been the gout. The ailment, however, is hereditary, and for a long time he has suffered the tortures of neuralgic and sciatic pains, and has often been compelled to adopt a rigid diet.

In politics Spurgeon has been a pronounced Radical, and has taken deep interest in the affairs of his time. Practically, and outside of his church labors, he has been a substantial friend of the poor, aiding them himself and through funds of philanthropy in those about him.

Outside of his own denomination Mr. Spurgeon's strongest impression upon his time has been that created by his sermon of about twenty years ago on "Infant Baptism." His latterly expressed belief in the vigor of manhood in the prime—he was born in 1834—and his production shook the whole theological structure of England. Its echoes may still be heard whenever the vexed question is discussed.

An American authority, The Baptist Quarterly, recently summed up the great English preacher in the following language: "No man in this generation has done more to uphold the trustworthiness of God's Word in Great Britain; no man has preached the Gospel with greater fearlessness, sincerity and power; no man has had a heartier God-speed for every good work; no man has shown more abundant love and charity for his fellows; no man more deserves the confidence and sympathy of Baptists the world over."—G. The Tariff on Silk.

The Dry Goods Chronicle has interviewed a number of silk merchants and manufacturers on the subject of the proposed duty on raw silk, intended to enable the American silk worm to compete with the pauper silk worms of Italy and Japan. Mr. Stocker, of the firm of Stocker & Gwalter, says that the whole production of raw silk in this country does not exceed 900 pounds. One hundred and fifty pounds is produced by the government board for silk culture in California. "To kill our present flourishing silk industry for the sake of being able to raise a quantity of raw material ten years hence," says Mr. Stocker, "is a policy that will never succeed in this country."

This means, we suppose, that the tariff must be, because it has been found in other parallel cases that killing one industry by means of a duty on raw material in order to promote another industry has succeeded very well. Efforts to accomplish similar results are making now in Washington city, and the question whether they will succeed or not depends on the number of votes obtainable, and this depends largely on the publicity given to them. We are inclined to agree with Mr. Stocker that the silk industry has not strong enough in the lobby to secure the recognition which its humble claims merit.—New York Evening Post.

As a teacher she is meeting with success.

Three papers under one general head, "The New Nationalism," will appear in the March issue of Belford's Magazine as the leading articles. The great and constantly increasing body who are interested in the important social and govern mental questions of the hour will find the newest phase of these questions intelligently described by J. R. Wakeman, Rev. Edward E. Hale, and Hon. Wm. McAdoo.

Whether there has been any amount of money misappropriated, or none at all, it is right for the people to know at all times what is being done, and they ought not to be compelled to attend every meeting of the municipal officers to find out either. The proper source of information is the official report as published over the signature of the clerk, and that report should give every resolution and vote in full.

"Now give us a little less free trade foolishness in each issue."—Sentinel. So say all the republican managers, who perceive that in the matter of tariff taxation the universal demand for reform is the one to win. With the laborer almost starving, while the prices of necessities of life go still higher, it is no wonder that the republican managers howls about everything else to divert attention from the need of tariff reform and lower taxation.

The meeting at Traverse City last week to arrange for advertising and developing the resources of Northern Michigan was well attended, and the results very satisfactory. After a thorough discussion of the needs and available resources of this region, a committee consisting of J. W. Milliken, S. Barnes, Thos. T. Bates of Traverse City, H. H. Noble of Elk Rapids, C. S. Hampton of Petoskey, Perry F. Powers of Cadillac and J. N. Tinklepaugh of Kalkaska was appointed to arrange for calling a board of trade convention to consider plans and projects, and $652 was subscribed on the spot and placed at the disposition of the committee

The 126 pages of the North American Review for February are filled with an ample variety of interesting, timely, and readable matter. The great discussion on Free Trade and Protection, begun by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Blaine in the January number, which has attracted such marked attention, is continued by the Hon. Roger Q Mills, representative in congress from Texas, and well known as the author of the Mills bill in the fiftieth congress, who replies to Mr. Blaine's defense of the policy of protection; and it is promised that in the next number Senator Morrill of Vermont, the author of the Morrill tariff of 1861, will take up the discussion of the same topic.

For five years the fine little steamer Thomas Friant has steadily plied between Harbor Springs, Petoskey and Mackinaw, but has never been hauled on the ways, and cost nothing in the way of repairs. This month however, the Petoskey Iron Works is overhauling her machinery and putting everything in first class shape. In March, though she does not make a drop of water, she will be hauled out and recaulked and painted, so that when she goes into commission she will be as good as new. The Friant is a good sample of honest boat building, and a thoroughly built and honest boat, like everything else, is the cheapest to an owner in the end. Capt. Vanderhoef has made up his mind that the season will open very early this year, and will have the Friant ready for business on time.—Petoskey Record.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

"Offices for the Poor."

EDITOR JOURNAL,—The filthy coyote who scribbles Hayes items for the Sentinel claims that we "champion our friends who want to live off the town." We haven't any such, and we know of no one in the town who has received more for less services than the jackal who sits on the town board and proposes to allow bills that come before that body, and afterwards goes to work and misrepresents the same in his indirect bid to the "poor taxpayer" for the office of supervisor. But he is good at misrepresenting things. He would like the readers of the Sentinel to think I paid po tax, but the truth is that since he has lived here, or since he has been able to pay any tax, my receipts would nearly double his, exclusive of any paid by the rest of my family.

I guess he has always wanted to give the offices "to the poor," but can not say with certainty since he has been here. When he was down in Indiana he tried hard to persuade the people there to give an office "to the poor," but I hear he did not succeed. Now I don't want to be personal, but I would advise "Jenks," before he takes any ten-acre lots to clear for his neighbors, that he clear out his own door yard first. I. S. W.

[The epithets in the above are not argument, and would not have been admitted had not the Hayes correspondent of the Sentinel begun by calling our correspondent a skunk. We do not approve of this kind of personal journalism.—ED. JOURNAL.]

A Rich Experience.

The editor of the Clare County Cleaver sums up his past five years experience there as follows:

Five years of the stern realities of attempting to guide into a successful channel the destinies of a newspaper, has taught us that "all is not gold that glitters," nor is there anything in that term "glory" which satisfies or takes the place of a natural longing for three square meals per day. On the contrary we have learned from the five years of newspaper experience that we have use for the same amount of the necessities of life that we did in former days,—that printers keep up an existence by the same means that does the ordinary day laborer,—that paper and ink cost money; in fact the whole machinery of a well regulated print shop costs several dollars more than several dollars more to keep it in running order. The prevailing opinion must be that a state of facts directly contrary to the above exist among newspaper men, but we can assure you that we have learned that such a condition of affairs actually exist, and that the editor, compositor, or devil will devour as much beefsteak in a day as the horny-handed farmer or day laborer.

Merit Wins.

We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell so well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great popularity purely on their merits.—F. G. Hines & Co., Druggists.

Prof. R. C. Enos, son of Prof. H. M. Enos of Charlevoix, and formerly principal of the Leland school, has been in South Dakota for two or three years, and is associated with Prof. W. H. Dempster in the publication of the Dakota Educator, a thriving educational journal, at Madison, S. D. Prof. Geo. A. McFarlane, who retires from the editorship, says in his closing editorial: "Though a young man and but three years in the state, Mr. Enos, through his connection with the Educator and his institute work, is undoubtedly one of the best known educators in South Dakota. Much of the valuable matter which our columns have contained has come from his pen. A more extended notice is unnecessary. These men will win success."

At the banquet of the Traverse City Business Men's Association last week, Vice President Mulliken, of the Chicago & West Michigan, was called upon, and consented to say a few words of encouragement. Remarking that in a few days he would retire from the position he now held, he assured the meeting that his successor would carry out the policy of the Chicago & West Michigan Road in developing this part of the country. The company, with $10,000,000 now in process of being invested here, would be bound by business principles to make that investment as valuable as possible. In no other way could it hope to receive returns so certainly as by promoting the industries of this region. There need be no fear that the railroad company would fail to co-operate cordially with the people in making known the opportunities afforded to all worthy enterprises in this section of the state.

Historical Society.

The meeting last Friday evening had the largest attendance of the season. The program was as follows: Instrumental duet, Misses Edna Green and May Guyles; paper, "American Journalism," Geo. A. McCartney; recitation, May Guyles; reading, "Four years of Journalism," Rev. J. S. Rood; instrumental solo, Miss Maggie Enos; reading, Miss Merritt; instrumental duet, Mrs. E. H. Green and Miss Maggie Green; reading, Mrs. O. S. Washburn; vocal duet, Misses Florence and Kate Smith. The next meeting will be held with Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Smith, Friday evening, 21st. Paper by E. H. Green, on "The Army and Navy."

Who is the Liar?

It will be observed that the statement in the Sentinel attesting the truth of some previous statement, is signed by only three councilmen, all republicans, the names of one republican and the two democrats being omitted. They have but one-half of the council, and require the vote of the president for a majority. The half-supported "glittering generality" is given as an offset to Mr. Stevenson's positive statement that he was not consulted.

Ice at Fife Lake.

The G. R. & I. railroad company is getting out ice at Fife Lake on a large scale. The master of transportation has opened an office at Fife Lake, and is giving personal attention to the traffic. For several days they had a force of seventy five or a hundred men cutting ice, and are loading a car every five minutes. All of the ice for the Pennsylvania railroad system is being taken from there, and large orders are received from various states. Fife Lake is undoubtedly the greatest ice market in the country just now, and so many trains are being sent out that this company has had to hire two big co-operatives of its D., S. S. & A. road. Orders enough have been received to take all the ice off Fife Lake.—Traverse City Record.

A LEGEND.

There has come to my mind a legend, a thing I had half forgot,
And whether I read it or dreamed it, ah well, it matters not.
It is said that in heaven, at twilight, a great bell softly swings
And man, may listen and hearkon to the music full of sweet rings
If he put from his hearts inner chamber all the passion, pain and strife,
Heartache and sorrow, hoping that throb in the pulses of life.
If he thrust from his soul all hatred, all thoughts of wicked things,
He can hear in the holy twilight how the bell of the angels rings
And I think there lies in this legend, if we open our eyes to see,
Somewhat of an inner meaning, my friend, to you and to me.
Let us look in our hearts and question, can pure thoughts enter in
To a soul if it be already the dwelling of thoughts of sin?
So, then, let us ponder a little—let us look in our hearts and see
If the twilight bell of the angels could ring for us —you and me.

—Rose Osborne.

THE DOOMED SHIP.

Out on the broad, blue ocean, not far from the equator, thousands of miles from any land, lying motionless on a calm sea, was a dismasted ship. Nothing remained of her taut masts and spars but the mizzenmast, the bowsprit and flying jibboom. From the mizzen topsail and crossjack yards hung a few ragged strips of canvas, and out at the far ends of the flying jibboom depended part of the stay and some fragments of a sail, torn and rent, just as it had been left after the fierce gale which had rendered this poor last ship so helpless a wreck.

Not a breath of wind was stirring in the heavens; not a cloud was in the deep blue sky; not a ripple or a flaw disturbed the far stretching ocean. It was high noon, and the sun was almost vertical. All was silent. The sun was pouring down its fierce tropical rays on the battered deck, and on the vast, calm sea. There she lay, a spectral ship upon a silent ocean. There was not a sign of life on board, not a sound could be heard, except now and again when a swirl of water made the rudder chains rattle and creak, as the wheel moved a few spokes backwards and forwards, or when an albatross flipped up from the sea, hovered over the ship and then flew away into the distance.

The day passed slowly, as many days had passed; the sun began to sink lower and lower in the western sky, and once more, like a blood red shield, it rank into the bosom of the ocean, leaving behind it a flood of crimson light which tinged the sky with its enangulined hues, and these, reflected in the water beneath, caused the ship to appear as though she was floating in a sea of blood. The crimson faded into orange and pink, and then into gray, and then the shadows of evening stole slowly over the scene; then one by one the stars came out and studded the whole of the cloudless firmament.

Suddenly there came from the cuddy window a stream of light, and a man, gaunt and emaciated, poured out on to the deserted deck. A few minutes afterwards another gleam of light shot from a small aperture in the door of the forecastle deck house, and two eyes, cruel, reddish brown eyes, also peered cautiously out. These two men had been for days waiting and watching for each other's death. They were the captain and mate of the vessel, who, when the crew had taken to the boats, had refused to desert her.

For days and weeks—how many they had no idea, for they had lost all count of time—they had been alone on the pitiless deep. At first they had made the best of their situation, day by day hoping and expecting that succor would come and they should be rescued. They had put themselves on short allowance of both food and water; but, notwithstanding, the food was at length nearly consumed, the water was quite exhausted, so that they had nothing left but what was drinkable in a few bottles of wine and brandy. To the torture of hunger was now added the agony of fearing thirst—a thirst which neither wine nor brandy would quench, but rather intensify.

Anything more horrible than their situation cannot be imagined and the dreadful conviction was being forced upon them that they must die.

This was the state of affairs three days previous to the opening of this story. The captain was sitting with his eyes apparently closed, and the mate was watching him with eager, hungry eyes. Up to this point the mate had been the most hopeful of the two, but now he had abandoned himself to despair.

No succor could reach them, he knew, while the calm lasted; but this was not the thought which was haunting his mind. "One of them must die—the death of the one would be the preservation of the other." This was the mental refrain which, as it were, formed the chorus to every other thought: "The death of one would be the preservation of the other."

He sat there eying the captain with a diabolical leer. He was no longer a man—he was a demon. Reckoning he started up by a revulsion of feeling, which is not common, in such cases, in had passed from helpless despondency into furious delirium. With a hoarse cry he sprang at Capt. Dunnett, brandishing a long knife in his hand. A fierce struggle ensued; it was short and sharp, and the mate, after being disarmed, was pushed forward and fell violently upon deck. Capt. Dunnett was the younger and stronger of the two, and, had he been so inclined, could have dispatched the mate with ease; but he contented himself with disarming him, threw the knife into the sea, retreated to the cabin and shut and locked the door.

The mate after this grew more furious, and, after vainly attempting to enter the cabin, withdrew to the forecastle and took up his abode there, and now for three days he had been waiting and watching for the captain's death.

To be buried alive has been thought to be beyond question the most painful of all deaths, but it is doubtful if the long drawn agonies which were being endured by these two men were not the more painful of the two.

"How long—how long can this last?" moaned Capt. Dunnett, as he sat and gazed out into the night. A painful sort of apathy was stealing over him. He had no hope, he made no effort, he had no longer any wish to live. If death were coming, his only prayer was that it might come quickly.

Slowly, minute by minute, the life was ebbing out of him; and as surely, with as tortoise like gradation, the night crept on. The moon had risen, and now, in full orbed splendor, was riding high in the heavens, casting a long wake of silver light on the placid sea which danced and flickered right away to the distant horizon.

The two lights still gleamed on to the deserted deck, and the two watchers still watched on.

Meanwhile, nature had not been idle. Away, in the distant horizon, great masses of fleecy clouds began to pile themselves up one above another, gradually extending themselves across the northern heavens. The cloud packing went on for more than half an hour, accompanied by hot puffs of wind which now and then ruffled the waters. The clouds more dense; vivid flashes of lightning shot across the sky, and there were mutterings of thunder in the distance.

The silent watcher in the cuddy saw nothing and heard nothing of all this. His head sank heavily on his breast, and he slept. Suddenly there was a noise beneath the deck like the scratching of a rat; then, slowly and noiselessly, the trap hatch under the table was lifted, and through the aperture a head, with curly red hair and fierce eyes, appeared. They were those of Jarvise, the mate. After pausing to see that all was clear, he placed his hands on the deck, and then, with a supreme effort, he silently lifted himself into a sitting posture, and again he paused to listen. He could hear the regular breathing of his companion as he sat sleeping peacefully, and a grim smile of satisfaction passed across his wild and haggard face. Silently and stealthily he crawled clear of the table and then stood up erect on his feet. His eyes glared wildly and his breath came quick and short as he drew a knife from his bosom and poised him self to strike.

All unconscious of his peril, Capt. Dunnett slept on. He had no idea of danger from such a quarter; no idea that the mate had for two days past been labering with maniacal patience and tenacity to clear an opening through the cargo, and had at length succeeded in making his way to the cabin hatch.

Jarvise stood over his intended victim, his eyes glittering with a diabolic light; the blow was in the act of descending, when his arm was arrested. The cabin was suddenly illuminated with a blue electric light, and a peal of thunder, loud as the crack of doom, broke over the ship. The mariner stood with his arm raised as though it had suddenly been paralyzed.

The crash of the thunder awoke Capt. Dunnett from his slumbers, and he sprang to his feet. He took in the situation at a glance; and, flinging himself in the way would be murderer, sought to disarm him. The struggle was for dear life, and the mate fought savagely. But he had the captain's superior skill and strength prevailed and Jarvise was once more at his mercy.

"Strike, man—strike!" shrieked the mate. "It is your life or mine!"

"I am mad, Jarvise!" exclaimed the captain.

"Yes, I am; but strike, man—strike! Put an end to this torture; I can stand no more of it."

"Never!" cried the captain, throwing him from him.

Then he turned and left the cabin, locking the door behind him.

Out on the deck a grand and startling scene met his view. The whole of the northern part of the heavens was enveloped in the blackest darkness, while the southern half was clear and bright. The next instant the northern half was also in unison with the most vivid light. But it was not this that caused such excitement in the breast of Capt. Dunnett. The central object in this scene was a large brig, not more than a mile and a half distant, bearing down to their succor, under a press of canvas.

For a second or two he stood rooted to the spot. Then, in a wild transport of joy, he threw up his arms and cried:

"Saved! Saved! Thank heaven! Thank heaven!"

All thoughts of Jarvise's diabolical attempt on his life vanished, and in an instant he had unlocked the cuddy door, and, seizing the mate by the arm, dragged him half stunned and dazed by his fall, out on to the main deck, and, as another flash of lightning disclosed the brig again to their view, cried:

"There! there! See what a merciful heaven has sent us!"

A second or two afterwards a vivid flash of lightning moved over the mizzen mast; it ran down the mast, which shivered, and, with a crash, fell over the side. With the first crash of thunder that followed Jarvise rushed toward the side, and was in the act of springing into the sea, when Capt. Dunnett leaped lightly back on the deck, where he lay, stunned and bleeding.

The lightning flashed almost incessantly. The wind came in hot puffs, the brig still held on her course. By this time she was within half a mile of them. But suddenly the hot puffs ceased and she lay motionless on the water.

All this while Capt. Dunnett and the mate, who had soon recovered his consciousness, stood watching her in an agony of suspense.

The gloom was rapidly deepening; the clouds were hurrying on; the moon and the stars had all disappeared, and the sky was one vast pall of inky blackness. Broad sheets of lightning now and again shot up from the bosom of the ocean, illuminating the whole mass of sea and clouds with a blue, spectral light, which made the portentous aspect of the heavens more visible, while the silence, when unbroken by the thunder, was solemn and oppressive.

But what was curling up from the open hatch in the cabin? It is smoke! At first it came in small wreaths; but now it was pouring out in a great volumes.

The ship is on fire!

The lightning, which had shivered the mizzen mast, had descended into the hold and set fire to the cargo, and the conflagration was spreading rapidly.

The two men, when they made this discovery, stood appalled with horror. They knew they were standing, as it were, on a volcano, for in the magazine below was stored a quantity of gunpowder, which might explode at any moment and blow the ship to atoms.

The smoke belched forth in large volumes, and now and again a bright flickering flame shot up from the hatchway.

In another few minutes the flames were pouring into the cuddy, and the whole structure was on fire. The flames extended, and in less than ten minutes the whole after part of the ship was on fire, the lurid glare lighting up the superincumbent clouds and leaden sea, and producing a scene of surpassing grandeur.

And now another danger was threatening them. Away in the distance there was a dull, sobbing moan, which each minute became more distinct—the tornado was fast approaching.

The last time they had looked at the brig she was lying becalmed; and they had imagined that at the rate the conflagration was extending there was little chance of succor arriving in time to save them, for now the deck was getting hot under their feet, and the fire had spread to the forecastle deck house; but at that moment they were startled by a sharp cry of "Ship ahoy! Ship ahoy!" and looking in the direction from whence the sound came, they saw a boat, manned with four oars, pulling rapidly towards them. In another minute the welcome sound of "in bow" was heard, and the boat was alongside.

No time was to be lost; the storm was roaring in the north, and if it burst upon them before they reached the ship their doom was certain. Again, the gunpowder in the hold might explode any minute, so they hurriedly lowered themselves into the boat and pushed off.

While the second mate was rescuing the two men from the burning ship, the captain and mate of the brig were making preparations for the coming gale, and before the boat had got alongside the sails had been furled and everything made snug.

Capt. Dunnett and his mate had been kept up by the excitement of the situation, but the moment they were on board the brig they fainted down off, and were taken below in a state of unconsciousness. This had scarcely been accomplished, and the quarter boat hoisted up and made fast, when the tornado burst upon them with terrific fierceness. For a few minutes they could neither see nor hear anything but the roaring of the tormented waters, and the howling and thundering of the wind. At first the brig reeled and staggered before it; then she rose up, and, like a furious steed, dashed on frantically in the wake of the burning wreck.

It was a scene of grandeur and horror which it would be difficult to equal, and excited awe in every heart. The force of the wind was tremendous, and the two vessels drove on madly before it. The wreck was now one mass of flame, the red glare of which lit up the foaming sea and the sky above, showing the outlines of the brig and the faces of her crew with terrible distinctness. The two vessels were running in parallel lines, and were not more than half a mile apart. Suddenly a towering mass of smoke and flame shot up into the sky. This was followed by a terrific report, and then all was black darkness. The powder in the magazine had exploded, and that was the last that was ever seen of that poor doomed ship.

At dawn the gale had gone continued and shortly after daylight it moderated, and by noon it had blown itself out, the clouds rent and the weather cleared up.

Capt. Dunnett and the mate were attended with all the kindness and attention which was necessary for men in their exhausted condition. Jarvise was delirious, and many more restless nights passed before he showed any signs of recovery. But he pulled through at last. The captain was also for a time entirely prostrate; but he, too, gradually regained his strength, and in a fortnight was on deck again.

Poor Jarvise was greatly embarrassed when he first met his old commander. He was naturally of a humane disposition, and now that the frantic passion which was begotten of despair had passed away he was heartily ashamed of his conduct.

"I was not myself, Capt. Dunnett," he said, apologetically. "I was mad with hunger and despair. The devil seemed to have got into my heart; and when I reflect on the thoughts that passed through my mind, and the things I planned during that time, my mind is filled with horror, and I blush with shame when I think of them."

"I am sure you do, Mr. Jarvise," replied the captain, soothingly; "let us forget all about it."

"Forget it, Capt. Dunnett," cried the mate, plaintively; "I shall never forget it! The misery and torment of that dreadful time will haunt me to my dying day."

"A dreadful time, truly," replied the captain, solemnly; "and I can only pray Heaven that no more two men may ever be called on to pass through such a dreadful ordeal as we did."

Amen," added the mate.—True Flag.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

The JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns. We want the country represented. Give us all the news in as brief a manner as possible. Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach us by later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality!

We ask our correspondents to avoid as much as possible those items which are not of general interest to the community, and readily understood by any reader. Several times recently items have been printed which could not be understood by more than a very limited number of persons. In the future they will be stricken out.

Eveline.

FEB. 25.—We notice our Ironton brother is out again. Hope to hear from him soon.

F. E. Miller and family left recently for their future home in Kansas City, Kan. Mr. Miller with his family came here from Grand Rapids some years ago for the benefit of his health, which he has since recovered, but as he has an opening in Kansas, where he expects to make his everlasting fortune, he has left our community. He was a good neighbor and took much interest in the affairs of Eveline and Charlevoix county.

The Pellston correspondent of the Petoskey Democrat says: "One of Mr. McNeal's teamsters, Homer McKee, smashed one of his fingers last Thursday evening between two logs." Homer is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Jas. McKee of this place, and his whereabouts have not been known here for some time. In consequence his parents are anxious to hear from him.

Will Jarman wishes to state for the benefit of the Enterprise correspondent, of this place, that the words "unheard of nervous shock" related by her, was, according to our doctor book, nothing serious, still we did not recover as quickly as did the Enterprise scribe of some unheard of fainting spell just before returning to her home on that pleasant Sunday morning in January last.

Peter Tuttle has commenced the erection of a residence, 14x20. He has the frame already up.

Now, Bro. Advance, we do not wish to contradict you, but we made no mistake in the item regarding Mr. F. E. Miller as having the grippe, the whole family were afflicted. We got the item from a neighbor, and Mr. Miller told us the same two days before leaving. Now in regard to sticking to our own locality, Bro. Advance, how far does our grounds go? As Mr. Miller is but one and a quarter miles from our habitation and three miles from Advance, we claimed him. Stick to your own locality, brother, and you too will be all right. We have also noticed on several occasions that when you lay wet sheeded from your hunting grounds, you too have got things a little mixed.

Wilson.

Mr. Sherman, engineer, is building a house near the mill for present occupancy.

We confess to our benighted state but we are not fortunate enough to receive the "Citizen," hence our question, Pleasant Valley.

Miss Wilson went home to Banks on Friday evening and now Afton school has a vacation for a week on account of her illness.

Mrs. R. Sherman returned on Wednesday last from a visit to her parents living near Charlevoix. Her health is somewhat better than before she went away.

Dr. and Mrs. Willard were seen on our streets on Saturday on their way home from an extended trip through Advance, Boyne City, etc. He reports many patients on that route.

Mrs. J. R. Cooper was taken very ill with neuralgia of the heart, on Thursday evening. Dr. Willard was summoned and she is now convalescent.

Messrs. Mears and Jones, of Boyne Falls, also Messrs. White and Robinson, of Boyne City, have been in this township talking railroad the past week.

We are surprised to learn that one of our brilliant galaxy of correspondents should be so i—t, or in other words, so far from the products of the press, that he (or she) did not know of a word coined a month ago, but for the benefit of Pleasant Valley and others who may be in his blissful state, we would say that it is la grippe or influenza.

Advance.

FEB. 25.—Charles Norton got one of his fingers badly hurt in Platen's saw mill the other day.

Godfrey Platen has gone to Chicago to purchase an engine and boiler, etc., for his saw mill, deeming more power desirable.

Miss Mary Hawkins has returned home from Canada, where she has been visiting.

Mr. Platen intends enlarging his dock to make more room for the handling of lumber.

Ammon Beers has taken one of William Staley's boys to keep till he is twenty-one years old.

It is reported that Owen Bartram, a former scaler for Mr. Foreman at this place, has been lynched out west in Washington for stabbing a man.

Another family moved into Advance to day. Who says Advance isn't booming? When Dr. DeLacey's church is built here, and we get the county seat, won't we shine?

Norwood.

The proceeds of the dance was $81.75.

Fred Jackson has bought a horse of Parker McIntyre.

Wm. Harris went to Charlevoix Tuesday.

Henry Runyan is back home again.

Geo. H. Van Pelt has sold his big team.

Everybody was surprised to see how Amos Miller and C. W. Brown managed such a large crowd and so well. They are rattling good floor managers.

Miss Alice Superaw went to East Jordan Sunday.

We had a little spar in town the other day between a cant hook and a scaling rule. The cant hook came out best.

Harbard.

FEB. 25.—Elder Whitman has been holding revival services here and a glorious work is being done. They will continue this week and perhaps longer.

Quite a number of Barnard people attended Mrs. Henry Clark's funeral at Charlevoix Friday.

Thomas Cannon and James Oldham of Petoskey visited friends here last week.

Mr. McLean and family arrived from Canada recently. They have not decided where they will settle. Mrs McLean is a sister of John Dougherty and Mrs. Rodney Bogart of this town.

Burgess.

Miss Emma Kane is sick with sore throat.

Loren Hamlin has bought another team of horses.

Special school meeting in district No. 4 on Thursday evening.

The following fund in another paper is applicable to some of the learned ones in this town:

"A wise man never cares to boast of his superior knowledge;
He differs from some tender dudes who buy their way through colleges.
They have an elevated air, and sometimes act like donkeys;
The "higher branches" always were the heritage of monkeys."

Ellsworth.

FEB. 18—Our township treasurer W. Byers, of Atwood, spent a day or too here last week, collecting taxes.

Mr. Van Arden, of East Jordan, made a business call on C. S. Campbell Tuesday.

The C. & W. M. engineer corps are encamped near Wm. St. Clair's. They ran their line right through Deline's lot but a few feet from his house.

Happy Hoosiers.

ABOUT FLAX GROWING.

AN INDUSTRY THAT HAS NOT FLOURISHED IN AMERICA.

It Has Been Known Since the Earliest Times and the Plant Is Cultivated Everywhere—Why It Has Not Comparative Failure in the United States.

There is hardly a thing that grows which requires more labor to make it useful to man than flax. From the time the seed is sown until the finished linen, linseed oil, or oil cake, is put upon the market, every process—and they are many and complex—calls for slow, patient manual labor. Machinery enters here and there, to be sure, but it has no such important place in the industry as it has had in cotton, for instance, since the invention of the gin, or in the making of woolen fabrics, or leather articles.

In spite, however, of the toil involved in cultivating flax and making cloth from it, and the very considerable knowledge required to conduct the operations, the industry is universal today, and is more ancient than history itself. The linen wrappings found on Egyptian mummies were made of flax, and even in barbarous countries the nature and value of the plant is recognized.

Flax is apparently of tropical origin, but it flourishes to the best purpose in temperate climes. In the tropics the seeds are richer and therefore more productive of oil, but the best fabric is obtained from northern cultivation. The best product comes from Holland and Belgium; but this is not so much due to superior quality of soil as to the extraordinary care exercised by the people in handling the crop. Next to this flax in quality is the Russian product, though the Irish crop may be said to be on about the same level. Irish linen certainly is famous enough to justify this supposition. In Egypt the ancient industry remains, a new start about twenty years ago through the influence of English capitalists, and by the same initiative it has come to be an important feature of agriculture in New Zealand.

The earliest settlers in New York brought seed with them from the Netherlands, and it was introduced into the Massachusetts colony in 1629 by statutory order. In 1750 there were many factories in Salem and Springfield for turning the plant into sail cloth. In several other colonies about the middle of the Seventeenth century bounties were granted for flax cultivation by act of parliament.

As population has extended westward flax has followed, so that today some of the most important of the fields and mills of this industry are west of the Mississippi. At the same time the magnitude of the industry has not increased in any proportion comparable to the population or area of the country. Every device of inventors to improve the work, every suggestion of scientists to shorten the long processes of preparing the fiber for the mill, and every measure of the legislators to stimulate cultivation, have failed to push it to the fore.

Of course the annual product, taken in gross, is something immense, reckoned by thousands of tons or millions of bushels, and this amount is greater today than it was fifty years ago, and of course there are many important factories and farms devoted to it. But it is a striking fact that in America a great proportion of the fields first devoted to the growing of flax have been turned to other crops. The industry is continually striking into a new soil, and the old fields are either abandoned or devoted to other purposes.

This is not due to the quality of the soil. Any good soil, well drained and thoroughly plowed and harrowed, will serve for the growth of flax. Sandy loams, where there is a good and regular rainfall in the spring, are better than any other lands, but there is an abundance of this kind of soil in America and no lack of natural opportunities for excellent products.

The secret of the slow development of the industry, or rather of its limited scope, lies in the high cost of manual labor. The crop cannot be reaped, like wheat and barley, by machinery, but must be patiently and carefully plucked up by the roots by hand. It also requires careful weeding when the plant is about three inches high. After the crop is gathered the seeds have to be separated from the stalk, a process that may be accomplished by a threshing machine, but in many parts of the world, where the best fabric is obtained, it is done by hand and a "ripping comb," a crude affair with iron teeth, through which the stalks are drawn, a handful at a time.

It is said that four men with these combs can separate the seeds from an acre crop in one day. Then the stalks must be steeped until fermentation takes place. This is one of the longest processes, and one upon which inventors have expended a great deal of labor. The best authorities seem to agree that the most desirable results are obtained from the slowest process, as the introduction of chemicals, etc., to hasten fermentation affects the inner fiber injuriously. A good many things follow after this before the outside husk of the stalk is removed and the inner fiber separated from the core and made ready for the spinner.

All this involves a vast amount of labor in which there is a minimum of economy in the handling of quantity at a given time. Almost all of the product is of value, the seeds making oil and oil cake, and even the water in which the stalks are steeped is of great service. It is found to contain nine-tenths of the nutritious matter of the plant, and when poured out upon the field helps greatly in restoring the soil.

Nevertheless, so great is the labor involved that flax cultivation in this country cannot be regarded as a profitable industry. It has had nearly three centuries of trial and has been fostered by bounties and tariff until it should be demonstrated its strength long since. The fact is our soils can be put to more profitable uses.

Meantime, to enable some growers to obtain prices from the people high enough to enable them to remain in the business, a duty of 7 to 11 per cent. is imposed on flax in various raw stages, and 33 to 40 per cent. on manufactured articles. The truth about this tax, as in so many other cases, is that it fails of its purpose entirely. It does not foster the industry as it pretends to do. The people pay more for their goods, thread, handkerchiefs, wearing apparel, etc., in order to keep alive a business that history has shown is not naturally profitable here. If the duty was abolished the prices would go down, the consumers would benefit and nobody would suffer, for the fields now devoted to flax raising would be turned over to more profitable lines of work.

A striking feature of the industry, and one that has caused much trouble, is the poisonous effects of the fumes arising from the steeping process, and the deleterious influences of the water used. The water may be turned to good use, as above indicated, but this is not always or wholly done, and nothing can live in any stream which serves to carry the water away. So great was the destruction of fish in the Ulster district of Ireland from this cause that, years ago, the manufacture was forbidden by law from disposing of the water by the way of rivers or brooks. Nevertheless the evil has never wholly removed, and hundreds of fish are killed annually even now by this agency.

With that care for minutiæ which distinguishes Europeans in their industries, the Belgians and Dutch add to their resources by sowing carrots with flax, thus reaping a double crop, and in many cases they get two crops of flax a year from the same field. In districts where flax is grown extensively in those countries there are said to be no paupers whatever, for the entire working population is engaged in cultivating for and harvesting the crop, and in winter in preparing it for use at the mills.

ORIGIN OF THE TARIFF.

A Measure Admittedly Intended to Benefit the Rich.

When the war of the rebellion was well under way and the government was in dire need of money, taxes were laid on all sorts of domestic products as well as on incomes. This system to a great degree drew the money needed for the prosecution of the war from the resources of men who had accumulated fortunes of more or less magnitude. Everything was stamped, and every transaction in business turned something into the use of the government. This was a general hardship, of course, but the effects were not directly felt by workingmen. Those who did feel the force of the direct tax were highly disgruntled, and they applied to congress for relief. Their application was accompanied by a tariff bill designed and openly admitted to enable those who had paid internal revenue taxes to be reimbursed.

That is—and this was also frankly admitted, even put forward as an argument in favor of the proposed measure—the rich who had paid taxes demanded some kind of a scheme to be put in operation by which they could get their money back from the people at large. It was not that they wanted to protect or foster industry. The tariff was needed so that foreign products could not enter this market without their price being greatly increased above the normal value. That would, and did, enable the rich manufacturers, dealers and others to add to the prices of domestic articles.

In that way they were enabled to make the people at large repay them for their taxes in the course of a few years; and as the war tariff has been continued ever since, with few changes, it follows that the income taxes have been returned to the original payer many times over. The pretense that the tariff benefits the workingmen is made when they need the aid of it for government necessities had disappeared.

Then the domestic manufacturers, having realized the inestimable benefits to protection as far as their own pockets were concerned, sought for any and every pretext for hanging on to the plan that enabled them to make extraordinary profits, extracting a plain bonus from the earnings of labor.

Benefits to Foreign Labor from the Tariff.

Godey for March is here. Parties wishing a useful magazine, one that exactly fills the bill, had better subscribe for Godey for this year. We guarantee that they will be satisfied each month. Godey Publishing Co., Philadelphia, Pa. Price $2.00.

Just before going to press the JOURNAL learns the outline of an important deal which will give to Charlevoix, as soon as spring opens, a planing mill with all its et ceteras. It is said that a firm of energetic, ambitious young men will be at the head of the business. We hope to secure the details before another issue.

When A. D. Cruickshank returned from Grand Lodge last Saturday, he announced his intention to locate in Grand Rapids within the coming month. Immediately some of his friends began quietly to prepare a surprise, and on Tuesday evening a party of about sixty marched into his house without previous warning, and proceeded to make themselves at home. The evening passed in very pleasant manner with games and social chat. Ice cream and cake were served during the evening. Mr. and Mrs. Cruickshank have many friends who will be sorry to see them move away.

The Sentinel may not be satisfied with any kind of "vindication" short of a republican sweep of all the offices in village and township government, but the JOURNAL is delighted with a report that comes from a recent meeting of the council. It is said that the ayes and nays were called on a vote, and supported with a remark that the council better go safe and careful, so as to not give occasion for any more criticism by the opposition. This is the right sort of "vindication" for the JOURNAL, and is a virtual admission that there was cause for our criticism in the beginning.

Oh, no, Bro. Bontecou, don't think for a minute that we shall be compelled to suspend, just because three republicans have stopped their pa paper. All that sad news has since been made up by our friends. We have expressions from the people every day that the JOURNAL is right. This agitation has served to lift the mask from those who profess friendship, but are at heart our worst enemies. It has at the same time moved into action many friends who, while realizing the value of the paper, were not doing all that was possible to give assistance and support. The JOURNAL is stronger to-day in the estimation of the people than ever before.

Historical Society.

The program last Friday evening was as follows: Piano duet, Mrs. O. D. Wood and Mrs. F. A. Smith; paper, "The American Navy," prepared by E. H. Green and read by Miss Maggie Green; select reading, "The Battle of the Kegs," C. J. Strang; piano solo, L. D. Kanagy; select reading, "Paul Revere's Ride," Miss Mary Wood; select reading, "Oration on the Death of Washington," Miss Flora Nelson; piano solo, Alice Cochran. The next meeting will be held with Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Wood. Paper by Rev. W. L. McCartney, on "Growth of Religious Work."

Remarkable Rescue.

Mrs. Mildred Carlisle, Plainfield, Ill., makes the statement that she was at death's door, afflicted on her lungs; she was treated for a month by her family physician, but grew worse. He told her she was a hopeless victim of consumption and that no medicine could cure her. Her druggist suggested Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption; she bought a bottle and to her delight found herself benefited from first dose. She continued its use and after taking ten bottles, found herself sound and well, now does her own housework and is as well as she ever was. ☞Free trial bottles of this Great Discovery at F. G. SHAVED SHINGLES.

Preparations for a Large Increase in Their Manufacture.

A. BUTTARS is making some important changes in the arrangement of the machinery of the Michigan Shaved Shingle Co. factory. The purpose is to facilitate the handling of timber as it comes into the mill, and increase the product of the mill with the same power and labor. The logway from the lake is now on the east side, running to deeper water, and entering the mill at the southeast corner. The saw mill and bolting saw have been turned one-fourth around, and more space made in the west side of the room. The steam boxes have been moved farther away from the main building, and the platform enlarged, and other steam boxes will be built, to add to the capacity of the factory. Another larger and faster cutting machine is to be put in place of the one heretofore in use; and some minor changes may be made in the arrangements for edging and packing. The refuse carrier has been changed so as to feed the furnace automatically, and at a great saving of labor. A fine stock of timber is being purchased, and everything points to a large increase in the product of the mill, and at a greater profit to the company, for the coming season.

Railroad Notes.

The C. & W. M. survey is now within a few miles of Charlevoix, and this is now headquarters. Engineer Hedges says his instructions are to find the best route to Charlevoix, and his opinion he has found a good one. The line is a little west of the D., C. & E. survey, and is said to be a little shorter. We have reason to believe that the road will be in operation soon, and that it will be built to Charlevoix, and not to any point east of Pine Lake. For months it has been asserted by various authorities that the road would be built to Charlevoix as soon as practicable, and every reason seems to be in accomplishment of that purpose.

Parties have been in town within a few days looking up the claims against the D. C. & E. grade made by Mr. Rod last fall, and it is reported that if they can be secured for a reasonable discount the cash will be forthcoming. We hope the report is true, as it will put a large number of worthy holders on their feet for business again, and put in circulation here several hundred dollars in money.

The camp of Chicago & West Michigan railway surveyors has moved to Ellsworth. H. B. Hodges, engineer in charge, will, however, make his headquarters at Charlevoix. Mr. Hodges says that although he has not received the road from the D., C. & E. survey, he has found a very good route indeed between here and White's farm on Wilson's lake, and that the grading will be very slight.—Bellaire Breeze.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Burns Explains his Position.

EDITOR JOURNAL.—My attention has been called to an item in the Sentinel stating that I did not sign that statement in regard to Mr. Stevenson's examination for reasons best known to myself. I will state that I gave my reasons for not doing so. When asked to sign that statement, it was all fixed up, and signed by the other trustees and clerk. I stated that I would not sign it unless the questions were put in that we asked Mr. Stevenson,—they could not have taken up much space as they were not numerous,—but for some reason it could not be changed. That is why I did not sign it. I was satisfied that Mr. Stevenson could run the engine if the same instructions were given him that Mr. Book or Mr. Ackert received.

JOHN BURNS.

Sentinel Falsehoods Refuted.

EDITOR JOURNAL.—In reply to the Sentinel of last week I would say that I still insist that I received no examination at the hands of the council. All the questions asked me by that body related only to where I had been in engine and how long.

I agreed to furnish satisfactory references as to my competency which were entirely ignored.

No mechanical questioning was done, which properly belongs to such an examination. No impartial steps were taken to ascertain my ability to do great service in the matter.

When a certain member of this council was presented with that shameful thing signed by the ring manipulators in the council why did he not sign it? Simply because he declared it to be a misrepresentation of the facts in the case.

Taking into account all these facts is the Sentinel justified in calling me a "liar?" I ask is not the lie pinned to that sheet which has so much disrespect for both man and woman. Has not the Sentinel a proverbial reputation for the lowest kind of vindictiveness?

I said to the council that I would prefer to get some instructions upon the management of that engine since it is a combination unlike those in common use. And in regard to the expense to the village of "educating apprentices," I agreed to bear myself all such expenses. Now I would enquire who were not apprentices that have ever managed that engine here? Please answer this question. I will not except the present incumbent of that position. Does not the fact that the manufacturers of that engine send with it a competent engineer argue the want of qualification on the part of any local engineer to run it. No insinuations are made against their favored apprentices, but because I am not a patron of the ring I must be raped and harrowed by a set of intolerant demagogues, whose judgment and acts must not be critized by the common people.

We are told by the janitor that the engine "groaned" fearing that the $175 bid would be accepted. Why such a dastardly thrust from him. Did not that engine groan infinitely more when under a certain management it cut its bearings so that it requires more particular attention than heretofore, being unable to accomplish what it did in a good condition. Who are the apprentices?

The statement of the Sentinel that the fire department would not respond to a call with me as an engineer is a point blank falsehood. I am in possession of definite authority in this matter. Such subtle crookedness is a prevailing fault of that paper. Now Mr. Sentinel, let us see you "smoke."

W. J. STEVENSON.

Wide Awake.

The March Wide Awake opens with a charming biography in miniature, by Mrs. Frances A. Humphrey, of "The Beautiful Emily Marshall," a famous young lady of Old Boston, Mrs. Humphrey has done her work in the most sympathetic manner, and while the personal beauty of Miss Marshall is fully portrayed, she has shown the spiritual loveliness which was the secret of her charm; the frontispiece gives her portrait, painted by Chester Harding, and owned by her daughter, Mrs. Samual Eliott. Among the illustrated articles are "Animals at School," by Eleanor Lewis and "Among the Date Palms," by Frances H. Throop, with her own drawings made in Africa recently," Poor Lady Ursula," by Lucia Beverley, is a true story of the fate of a young Englishwomen who came to Maine in the early days; the "early days" of another portion of our country, California, furnishes the material for another story, Mrs. General Fremont's "A Picnic Near the Equator," "The Coltie that Kicked Up" will delight little people, and young and old will read with interest Miss Poinsen's "Early America in Clay," which shows how successful and really necessary kindergarten work is in all schools for the blind. The article has some twenty illustrations of historical objects shaped in clay by the sightless children. Ingenious boys and girls will be apt to try Mr. Beard's "Musical Correspondence," a very ingenious system of cypher. "The Kafuskak Giant," by Miss McLeod, is a powerful story of Old Acadie, and shows what a romance of historical tradition lies unworked in it. Miss White's "Newspaper Workers" will be read with profit. Mr. Stoddard's serial "Gid Granger" is worth reading, and Mary Hartwell Catherwood begins a western serial story entitled "Bonny and Ban." Wide Awake is $2.40 a year. D. Lothrop Co., publishers, Boston, Mass.

THE DYING HORSE.

Fall back! Fall back! Give him room to die!
Hard is the bed where he sends usual lie.
For his tolerance life this is the end!
Ha! he no master—no loving friend!

Is it here the old horse must welcome death,
Where a gaping crowd watches every breath,
Under the midsummer's scorching sun?
Is this his reward for work well done?

How his limbs shudder! How his eyes roll!
Seek they at last for a pitying soul?
Or only for quiet—quiet to die
In some lonely valley green, where a brook gurgles by?

No; he knows nothing of clover fields cool,
Where cattle at noonday stand deep in the pool.
He never wandered the pastures sweet—
His roadway through life was the stony street.

Cherished while work brought his master gain,
To strangers left in this hour of pain;
Deserted now that his task is over;
Not for his old days are the fields of clover.

Not for him will the field lark sing,
Nor for him will liberty come spring;
Is he tired old age, in some country home.

Here he must suffer—here he must die
Under the midsummer's scorching sky.
Him the broad shade tree will never wave;
He has known but the pavement his whole life through.

Still we in our vaunted pride of soul
Conceive no future, no restful goal,
No eternal pasture in regions blest
Wher. the poor old horse may be put to quiet rest.

—Chicago Ledger.

ONE NIGHT OF HORROR.

One night I went to bed with glossy brown hair, and the face of a girl of 18, next morning I left my room with hair as gray as it is now, though forty-two years has passed away since then.

In one night an awful horror struck me suddenly with the weight of scores of years.

My father was a Mr. Marriot, a ship broker, who lived in Russell square with his family, consisting of my mother and four children, of whom I was the eldest. One morning, in the December of 1843, while we were sitting at breakfast, my mother said, as she finished reading a letter which had just been delivered, "It's from Judith. She wants Ellen to go and stay a month at The Willows. But I do not like the idea. She never even called on us when she came back to England last summer. Besides, we have known almost nothing of her for years past."

"Oh! I should like immensely to see Aunt Judith," I cried.

"But you have never seen, and don't know anything about her," replied my mother. "It is nearly ten years now since I saw her, and she didn't leave a very pleasant impression on my mind. I had not seen her of course, since I was a child, but, as I have often told you, there was something curious and weird about her that was not to my liking. In fact, she did not seem like a sister of mine."

Aunt Judith was my mother's elder sister by fifteen years. When she was about twenty she married a German baron who was a professor in a university. Why it was nobody knew, but seven or so after her marriage Aunt Judith became very apathetic as regarded her relations in England, and hardly corresponded with them.

Her husband, the baron and professor, died about three years before the time of which I speak. Meanwhile she was unknown in those days; still she might have sent a word to inform her sister of her bereavement. To our great astonishment, it was only from a friend who attended the funeral we heard that she was dead and that she was a widow.

Well, both my father and my mother were unwilling to let me go to The Willows; my mother, because she had, or seemed to me to have, a prejudice against her sister; my father, for no reason that I could make out, except that he echoed my mother. At all events, I overcame their opposition at last, and started, one fine, or rather gloomy, morning—for the clouds were dark and heavy. I remember, as I left London—for the Willows, a mansion in Warwickshire which had been left to my Aunt Judith by my grandfather. Traveling was slower in those days than it is now, and it was not until nearly 6 o'clock in the evening that I drove, in the lumbering coach which conveyed me, up the dreary carriage path which led to The Willows.

Aunt Judith had only returned to live there during the past six months, so I was not surprised to find the place in a very untidy state. Such, at least, was my impression from what I saw through the darkness of the evening.

Things, however, seemed to change for the better when we drew up at the house itself. It was a great, straggling building, which had stood for more than a century, and was cold and forbidding to look at from the outside. But from the windows, and what I could see of the hall, it seemed to be well lit, warm and well appointed within. A female servant came out to meet me as the coach stopped at the door.

"Miss, Marriot?" she inquired, in a German voice, as I descended.

"Yes," I replied.

"Ah! your aunt would like well to see you," she said. "I shall take you to her. She is dressing for dinner." I followed her up stairs, and into a large bedroom. Standing before a glass at the end of the room was a tall woman whom, from the description I had heard of her, I immediately recognised as Aunt Judith.

Her figure was very erect, almost majestic, but her face puzzled me. Its features were very regular, and clearly drawn. There was in them a considerable amount of power, and yet, what I could not understand, a curious, wizened, almost craven expression, which just bordered on being sinister. I was only a girl at the time, and knew nothing of physiognomy, but instinctively, I felt a sense of uneasiness as I met her keen gray eyes, which seemed never to rest for a moment, but to wander about as if at the bidding of an uneasy spirit, though her demeanor was otherwise cordial, calm and self possessed.

"Your room is not ready yet, but it will be presently," she said, when we had greeted each other; "you can dress here. We have a few friends to dinner to-night. Your parents are well, I hope."

"Your parents!" and this in allusion to her own sister, whom she had not seen for years! Her greeting—in fact, her manner, everything about her—was perfectly polite, but strangely cold.

"Yes," I replied, "they are quite well, thank you."

"You can come down stairs when you are ready," she continued, as she stood before the glass, giving the last touches to her toilet. "Dinner will be on the table in about twenty minutes. I had better go down—they will be waiting for me," saying which she left the room.

A curious woman, I thought, when she was gone; and, altogether, I did not care much about her—perhaps, also, I was a little sorry that, against the wishes of my parents, I had come to The Willows at all. When I came into the drawing room I found a party of about a dozen people assembled there. There were, besides my aunt and an elderly German lady, who was a relative of her late husband, the clergyman of the parish with his wife and two daughters, the local doctor—a good looking young man of about six or seven and twenty; the squire and three or four others, who, like myself, were staying on a visit at the house. Dinner passed very pleasantly. We had music and a dance when the gentlemen came up stairs. Altogether I enjoyed myself very much, and it was past midnight when we rose from the supper table. One thing I did notice almost unconsciously during the evening, and this was a strange, absent, and at the same time searching, expression which sometimes came upon Aunt Judith's face. It was as though she were looking at or for something which was invisible to everybody else.

Well, when supper was over, and those of the guests who were leaving the house had taken their departure, I went with Aunt Judith to her bedroom, "to see, if she said, "whether Sophia had got my room ready yet."

Sophia was waiting for us when we entered the room, and my aunt and she immediately began to talk in German. "I had also my ears aching! I could not tell, as I did not understand the language; but somehow, from their manner or the tone of their voices, it seemed to me as if they were discussing something which they did not want me to know about. At last my aunt said to me in English:

"My dear, I am sorry the room I had intended for you is not ready yet. It will be ready to-morrow, but for to-night you must sleep in another room."

Here Sophia said something in German, and after a moment's pause Aunt Judith said, as if in answer:

"The blue room. Yes, my dear," she continued, speaking to me, "it is an old fashioned room, but very comfortable. Sophia will show you to it. Good night, dear."

Again the curious look I had noticed before came over her face as I left the room with Sophia, who walked before me with a candle.

We went up a flight of stairs that led to a part of the building which seemed to be but little used. At the top of these stairs there was a long narrow passage, the walls of which were lined with oak panels. When we got to the end of this passage we turned to the right and went a few yards down another and similar passage, until the servant opened a door and led into a spacious bedchamber.

Having put the candle on the mantelpiece, and laid my traveling bag, which she carried with her, on the floor, she looked curiously round the room, and then, when she had bidden me good night, went out and shut the door. I felt very nervous as I looked about the apartment, which seemed to be in an uninhabited part of the large house, and was furnished, I thought, in an antique and rather grewsome manner. The lofty walls, paneled as they were with wood painted blue, contrasted strangely with the heavy silk window curtains, which were of a dark red color, and with some old portraits in oil that hung in massive oak and ebony frames. The chairs and tables were all cumbrous and old fashioned, and, as to the bed, it almost frightened me to think of sleeping in it, so vast and gloomy did it look with its huge canopy and somber curtains.

It is not easy to go to sleep at once during the first night of one's stay in a strange house, especially if anything has happened to make the mind uneasy and suspicious. For a long time I lay awake wondering at the curious look I had seen on Aunt Judith's face, and shivering, now and again, as I thought how far away I was from the rest of the household. If I were to be taken suddenly ill, or if anything were to happen to me during the night, what could I do? There was a bell rope in the room, but I had forgotten to ask Sophia whether it communicated with a bell, and, if so, whether there was any one to answer my ring. Isolated as I was in this large and gloomy chamber, my mind was agitated with vague fears as I felt it must have been nearly two hours before I got to sleep.

How long this state lasted I do not know, when suddenly I awoke. In a moment I was wide awake, staring before me into the black darkness and listening intently to the profound about me. My waking was I doing this! I asked myself, but could not give any answer. Something must have happened to awake me. Vague was it? I wondered. I looked and listened. There was only blackness and silence.

For many seconds I lay thus peering and listening, and was just on the point of shutting my eyes again, when, glaring at them through the darkness, I saw two other eyes, so close to my cheek came the breath of something—man, or beast, or monster! I drew my head some inches back; the eyes, to which mine were rivet ed, advanced. I felt a form bending over the side of the bed. It stopped. The eyes stopped, the form became motionless. In the pure agony of the moment—actuated by this alone—I rose a little in my bed, and bent my head forward; the form also rose, and the eyes, which were still fastened on mine, retreated. As they did so, to my unutterable horror I discerned two eyes of a human face!

It was within a few inches of my own; and now my eyes, becoming accustomed to the darkness, could see that it was covered with hair. There was a dreadful gibber—such as might come from an ape or a dumb man in pain—and before my fascinated gaze flashed two rows of shining teeth. The creature—monster or maniac—was by my side, ready, waiting to spring upon me. Hot upon my face came its breath, while the awful eyes alone like the eyes of a tiger. It was on the spring—to tear my limb from limb. Just one thing stayed it. Just one thing was keeping off the awful death that threatened me. In all the ecstasy of my terror I comprehended what that one thing was. It was the power of my eyes. I was fighting an eye battle with the monster.

Into its dreadful eyes I gazed, as though I was gazing into the very gates of hell. Like the eyes of a wild beast, they seemed over restlessly pouring forth a tumultuous torrent of passion, and ever restlessly in search of mine, which yet they shrank from when they met. Constantly as they did so there was the same hideous, inarticulate gibber of baffled rage.

Thus some two or three hours at least must have passed until the daylight began to steal in through the curtains, which were only partly drawn.

When the light came the sight before me was even more horrible than my imagination had conjured in the dark. Crouching by the side of the large bed, between the window and me, was a man. But such a man! A tall man in a flowing gown, with long, matted, unkempt yellow hair and beard, his face deadly white, but every muscle in it throbbing in convulsive sympathy with the fire that blazed from his wild and awful eyes!

Minute after minute passed, though I took no heed of them. All my thought, all my strength was concentrated into the one weapon I had—my eyes. Still, I felt at last that I could not prolong the battle much longer. What was I to do? My strength was giving way. The monster or maniac was becoming more and more excited, foaming at the lips and uttering short, sharp cries, while his long, cruel fingers worked convulsively, as though they were impatient to be on their prey.

So long as I could ward him off with my eyes, he dared not approach me nearer, directly, through faintness, I dropped them, he would fall upon me and tear me to pieces. My strength was going. A look of exultation came upon his face. The daylight had lasted for a long time. Oh, God! would no one ever come? I could hold out no longer. His glare of triumph increased. My eyes were getting dim. His face was getting nearer and more exulting.

It seemed as though another spirit came suddenly into my body—I was hardly conscious of what I did—looking fiercely on or behind him, he ceased to seem to be mine, I rose in my bed, bent forward my body, eye to eye, drove the creature back till he was more than a yard from the bed—slipped from the bed—gave one spring—caught the handle of the door, and was in the passage running. There was an awful noise behind me of wild yells and laughter and pursuing feet. As I fled, screaming, down flight after flight of stairs, it grew nearer and nearer. The monster was upon me. A number of people seemed to be about me. I heard shouts and blows—a confused trampling, shouting and scuffling—and then all was dark.

When I awoke I was in bed. I had been very ill for many days, they said. It was a long time before I was allowed to see a looking glass; when I did, I found that my beautiful brown hair was gray. It had changed its color in that one awful night. The maniac was Aunt Judith's only child, who had escaped during the night from the room where he was confined. Aunt Judith, and the baron when he was alive, had secretly kept the poor creature since he had been discovered during its infancy to be insane. The constant sorrow and anxiety which it entailed was, I may add, the cause of most of what was strange about Aunt Judith.—Saturday Review and Republic.

Cramped on a Volcano.

A special dispatch from the City of Mexico states that William H. Dickinson, the young Boston naturalist, has finished his work in the Sierra Nevada mountains, and on the active volcano of Colima, where he has been camped for the last two months. From the extreme summit of the Sierra Nevada he could look down into the crater of the volcano. There were every five hours or more signs of activity, great clouds of vapor, gas and ashes coming up with magnificent effect and rising to a tremendous height. But from the Sierra Nevada no sound could be heard.

Richardson, being determined to investigate nearer at hand, moved his camp to the side of the volcano on the usual conical rank, pitching his tent at the upper line of pine trees and just below the lower lines of ashes and lava. From this point Richardson and his Indian followers could hear the sounds of the volcano.

One night during the eruption they could distinctly see the deep red glow of molten lava as it ran down the mountain. Richardson was regarded by the native as phenomenally daring, but he was prudent enough not to harm to himself or to his party.—Boston Cor. New York Herald.

The Muscle Shoals Canal.

The obstruction known as the Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee river, which covered about 25 miles out of the 453 between Chattanooga and Paducah, at its mouth, are at length overcome by means of locks and dams built by the general government, and the river is now open so that boats loaded at New Orleans can at all times proceed to Chattanooga, and most of the time to Knoxville. The distance from Chattanooga to New Orleans is 1,601 miles, as against 3,067 from Pittsburg, 1,567 from Cincinnati, and it is claimed the coal freights from Chattanooga to New Orleans will be between 80 and 90 cents, as against $1.05 from Pittsburg. The improvement is one of the short piece of the river has been more or less under construction for sixty years.—New York Telegram.

For Homes, For Business, For Manufacturing, For Pleasure, For Investment.

MOST DELIGHTFUL PLACE to live in summer, and a healthful climate in winter, with its usual unchangeable and invigorating, but not severe temperature.

FOR $300 a man can buy a nice hardwood tract, clear it up, and have a neat farm.

FOR $500 he can do still better. His logs and wood can be sold to the miners and lumbermen at fair prices, and he can live and clear his farm at the same time.

FOR $1,000 he can buy a small, partly-cleared farm.

$2,000 TO $10,000 will buy good farms in the various portions of the country.

CITIES AND VILLAGES have their graded schools, church and society privileges, and one seeking a healthful location, free from eyechoice, epidemics, drought, and all annoying visitations, should come to Northern Michigan.

BUSINESS.—There are numerous openings for business men with either small or large capital.

RESORTING.—Northern Michigan is famed for its summer resorts, fine fishing, and picturesque scenery.

CROPS.—Crops of all kinds do well. Oats, wheat, corn, barley, rye. Finer spring wheat isn't grown anywhere in the world, than in northern Michigan.

MANUFACTURING.—The chances for capital are endless. Furniture, wood pulp, wooden ware, chairs, and everything which the numerous varieties of wood go into, afford the manufacturer a choice.

LEFT BEHINE AT THE HOTEL.
Some of the Matters Overlooked by Hurries and Forgetful Travelers.

Left behind in New York has a storeroom for valuable articles left behind by guests. In such hotels as the Astor, the Fifth Avenue, the Sinclair, the Hoffman and hotels further up town, a set of books is kept in which are jotted down descriptions of the goods forgotten by absent minded and hurried ones. Where the hotel does a vast amount of transient business it is sometimes difficult to arrange the goods for future identification. In such cases the integrity of servants must be the guarantee, and this is strictly relied upon. Immediately after the rooms are vacated the chambermaid takes temporary possession. She gathers up the goods left behind by the last occupant and hands them over to the clerk. He looks on the register and tags the packages and articles with the name of the guest and the number of the room he occupied on the day of departure.

All these notes are then transcribed into the books kept for such business. If the guest is well known at the hotel all the articles found after his departure are extremely valuable, he is immediately notified and requested to identify the property. Otherwise the goods are kept until his next visit.

"We've got a toothbrush and a pair of shoes of yours here. Send 'em up!" is the greeting that some out of town patron of the house receives.

"You left a pair of trousers behind last time," is hurled at another.

If there is a woman in the case the housekeeper is notified from the desk when the husband registers, and pretty soon the housekeeper knocks on the door of the couple's apartment, and the wife is informed that on her last visit she forgot her bustle, or a bunch of hair, or a chemise, or a petticoat. The game of a woman's lingerie is sung, for women are quite as forgetful as men. The housekeeper usually visits the room with the missing articles, and hands them over on the spot.

There is scarcely a hotel in New York that couldn't start an umbrella shop. Everybody seems to forget an umbrella. Go to any hotel in town and tell the proprietor that you thoughtlessly left one behind while at the hotel. He will summon the porter and direct him to take the best and umbrellas. Pretty soon the porter is heading for you, staggering under a great load of umbrellas. There are cotton ones, gingham, and articles of the finest silk, with gold and silver handles. No particular or formal call is necessary to identify an umbrella. The property is marked and cannot be lost. If he kept strict account of all the umbrellas left in his establishment his bookkeeper couldn't have anything else to do. An old customer told Landlord Aubman of the Sinclair house, the other night in the rush time that he had forgotten his umbrella a few nights before, and had left it in the dining room. Mr. Ashman thereupon ordered the porter to bring out the best umbrellas. There was a hundcart load of them.

It is a particularly interesting fact that lumber sawed and bills filled to order. Hence the usually found on the wharves. The ladies are the chief delinquents in this respect. Before washing their hands they pull off their rings and lay them on the washstand. In the hurry to get to the dining room prepatory to leaving on the next train, the rings are frequently forgotten. Sometimes they are very valuable. There have been frequent instances where whole boxes of jewels have been left in. These invariably find their way to the clerk and the owners are soon found. Watches innumerable are found made pillows, having been put there by guests on retiring and overlooked in the rush of the morning. Many pocketbooks, some of them substantially lined with greenbacks, are forgotten, often no doubts to the embarrassment of the owner. It is not considered by regulated minds in the first chip comfort to find themselves away from town on a New York Central or a Pennsylvania flyer without a copper. But telegraph, if the operator will trust you, and the wallet will be hurried after you either by express or registered mail.

Then there are gold pencils, gloves, shoes, hats, coats, overcoats, eyglasses, spirit lamps, shirt studs, powder boxes and hand glasses. One enterprising citizen forgot his grippsack and everything in it the other night. Another left with a valuable set of surgical instruments. There are more toothbrushes forgotten in New York hotels in a week than any shop in New York can replace on the instant. Slippers, cuffs and collars enough to start a haberdasher's shop, ladies' scarfs made of silk and all other textures, night dresses of lace and plain, ladies' hats, trusses, shawls, bootjacks, rubber coats, bracelets, opera glasses, ladies' hats, entire suits of clothes, ladies' fans, fancy sacks, fans, Bibles, sermons, dress waists, garters, corsets, carriage robes and hundreds of other articles make up the year's collection in the big hotels of New York. When the owner is not found the goods are usually kept a year. No hotel clerk is too proud to know what becomes of them after that.—New York Sun.

Senator Davis and His Wife.

It was the good fortune of Senator Davis to win a splendid woman, and it was Miss Agnew's good fortune to wed one who was destined to occupy a seat in the United States senate. Mrs. Davis soon became prominent in Washington as a social leader, though she is by no means ashamed of having made her living by the needle. Indeed, she makes her own clothes because she can make them better than the artists in that line. She is now a very accomplished woman, painting in oil and water, speaking several several languages and being an accomplished horsewoman.—Washington Letter.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

The JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns in which it is not represented. Give us all the news in as brief and concise a form as possible. Correspondents should be mailed so as to reach us no later than Wednesday evening. We can use occasionally on the books. Unless this is done, mistakes and misunderstandings are almost sure to follow. Please remember it.

Boyne City.

MAR. 4.—We have lived one year under the reign of Harrison "la petite" and still the good times which were prophesied, if he was elected, seem to be in the distant future.

A dozen or more horses have died in the lumber camps near this town in the last few weeks. One died in R. W. Beech's camp last night. They were not scrubs either, but mostly valuable horses. It is a query what causes the mortality among them.

One of the county poor who was boarded at Charles Call's, died last week. Short religious services were held at the house by Rev. J. Burge. He had a wife and family, who, we are informed, were notified of his death; they were not present, however.

The county surveyor has been engaged a week or two looking out the most feasible route for a railroad from East Jordan to Clarion by way of Boyne City, and we understand has submitted his maps and estimates to the surveyor of the C. & W. M. road.

Your reporter was attacked by la grippe last Thursday; got all he wanted of it in a hurry. He is better at this writing.

It was on Friday. The 'Squire had been out hunting all day, and it was not a good day for game either, came home cold and wet, got his supper, and after carefully hanging his wet pantaloons up over the stove to dry, went to bed. When he woke, the room was full of smoke and he saw a light. Jumping up he found something blazing on the stove. It was the pants. Taking them on the poker and looking the other way for fear the cartridges in the pocket should explode, he carried them out. This was the reason he wore summer pants for a day or two.—[Is this a joke on 'Squire Martin?—Ed. JOURNAL.]

ADDIE LEWIS, Teacher.

The farmers must continue to groan over their hardships until they awake to the foolishness of tariff laws which compel them to buy in a high market and sell in a low one.—Buffalo Courier.

Pleasant Valley.

MAR. 4.—There is a bee to-day to cut wood for Silas Deming, who was hurt while loading logs in Beech's camp about two weeks ago. An abscess formed on the injured knee and though he is improving, his physician, Dr. Kay, says he must not attempt to work for at least two weeks. A committee from Maj. F. E. Miller camp No. 180, S. of V., of which he is a member, visited him last Sunday.

John A. Newville came near losing his left eye last Saturday while cutting logs in the woods. A sharp limb struck him, just missing the sight, but making a painful wound.

Van R. Newville and W. C. Burdick made a trip to Petoskey on business last Monday.

Capt. Haynes has purchased a mate for his pony, from Dr. Kay.

The P. V. E. club held their regular election of officers last Friday night and elected Mr. Nigel B. Burdick president, Miss Bernice Newville vice president, and Miss May Newville secretary, for the ensuing month.

Palmer Chase of Bay Springs visited at J. A. Newville's Sunday.

The family of W. C. Burdick are among the latest victims of "the inevitable."

Inwood.

Wm. Byers and wife of Banks visited friends in Inwood last week.

Miss Carrie Hilton will have a musical at Atwood, March 7th, assisted by Charlevoix talent. The proceeds go to the pastor at Atwood.

David Prosser and Fred Jackson traded horses recently.

Plenty of snow now for all work.

A girl baby at George Miller's.

Albert O'Brian sold his horse team at East Jordan, and has quit lumbering and returned home.

At Antrim City mill pond they charge twenty five cents a load for ice.

Geo. Wells has returned home from the lumber woods.

All the farmers are looking for an early spring.

Olen Weed has bought a horse, and now he has a team.

The town treasurer has attached some of Smithson's personal property for taxes in this town.

Wm. Byers of Banks had a lot of sheep worried by dogs last week.

A. Chase will stay on the O'Brian place this coming summer.

Tom Sinclair and Henry Hilton are cutting fallow.

James McGeagh lost two fingers in the saw-mill last week.

Burgess.

MAR. 4.—Mrs. Walker of Norwood was visiting with her sister, Mrs. Wm. Baker, last week.

George Bacot lost a valuable cow last week.

Rev. Mr. Moody is to preach a discourse on the change of the Sabbath day, in the school house in district No 1, on March 23, at 2 p. m. All are cordially invited to come.

We would endorse the "cheap advice" of Jenks, and if your correspondent could not fill the bill there is no doubt of finding "ability" in Hayes to fill the cowboy ——what is it Jenks? We haven't any dictionary "too poor."

Echo.

Our lumbermen are looking happy.

Isaac Vance is so as to be about again.

Cliff Papineau and family of Charlevoix are spending the winter at Mr. McMillan's, Mrs. Papineau's parents.

We hear that our neighbor J. A. King has an increase of pension. Glad to hear it was needed.

Geo. Vance has his brother's team from Wilson driving it these days. Isaac Washburn is driving George's.

Eveline.

MAR. 4—We understand Mrs. Esther Jane Hayden is improving.

Joe Tuttle tells us he will start for Grand Rapids soon, where he will remain some time.

Miss Carrie Hilton of Norwood, who has a class in music at Ironton, informed us Monday that her class is progressing finely. Miss Hilton gives good satisfaction.

Mr. Clark of Ironton, will move to Charlevoix soon, to live.

MARCH 5.—This is the coldest day of the season.

The C. & W. M. surveyors are encamped at St. Clair's point on the Intermediate.

Mrs. Deline made a business trip to Boyne Falls last Monday.

Mrs. Brooks accompanied her brother to their home in Vermontville the other day.

Wilson.

Winter weather, clear and cold.

Thermometer went down 19 below zero on Saturday night.

Miss Wilson returned to her school on Monday, quite recovered from illness.

Geo. Vance of Echo made a business call on and took dinner with J. R. Vance on Monday last.

Rev. and Mrs. H. C. Schofield visited at A. E. Scofield's in South Arm township one day last week.

Mr. Sherman has moved into his house recently built and is quite comfortable.

The school in the Richardson district has closed. Miss Cole is a very successful teacher and is much liked by her pupils.

David Ruch received news on Thursday that his wife was very ill and Jessie was also sick. He went immediately to them at Greenville.

A new order of things at the mill began with the present month. Mr. Cooper has gone elsewhere. J. R. Vance takes charge of the mill. Logs still continue to come in lively.

The largest log brought in this season was an elm, 1,011 feet. R. Lewis hauled it for Vance from S. Newland's. The tree it came from had 3,000 feet of logs in it.

The secretary of school examiners, R. L. Corbett, visited Afton school on Monday last.

Chas. Knuttel, of Saginaw City stock hands with friends here the week. Also visited a sister at Dwight's He returned home again on Thursday.

J. R. Vance and family, Eld. Schofield and daughter, attended church at South Arm on Sunday afternoon. Elder Gulick preached a very good discourse. Subject, "Prayer."

Ed. Gill has hone to East Jordan to work. Mr. Black goes to St. Ignace. Wm. Saunders "sets" on the the carriage, while Ed Holland is at the slab saw.

Notwithstanding no notice was seen in the county papers of the spring examinations, the teachers have found out that it occurs at Boyne City on Mar. 6. What is the Boyne Citizen about? We are wondering.

NO FIRES THERE.

A People who Shiver for Six Months and Perspire During the Rest of the Year.

Fashion rules the world over. Every people has customs of its own, many of them strange enough to outsiders. Mr. Curtis, in his "Capitals of Spanish America," comments upon one of the curious notions prevalent in Santiago, a city which he describes as "by far the most modern and elegant fashionable resort in S ith America." Although the climate of Santiago is similar to that of Washington or St. Louis, the people have an idea that fires in their houses are unhealthful, and, except in dwellings built by English or American residents, there is nothing like a grate or stove to be found. Every one wears the warmest sort of underclothing and heavy wraps indoors and out. The people spend six months of the year in a perpetual shiver and the other six in a perpetual perspiration. It looks rather odd to see civilized people sitting in a parlor surrounded by every possible luxury, fire alone excepted, wrapped in furs and rugs, with blue noses and chattering teeth, when coal is cheap and the mountains are covered with timber; but nothing can convince a Chilano that artificial heat is healthful, and during the winter, which is the rainy season, he has not the wit to warm his chilled body. It is odd, too, to see in the streets men wearing fur caps, and with their throats wrapped in heavy mufflers, while the women who walk beside them have nothing at all on their heads. During the morning, while on their way from mass, or while shopping, the women wear the manta, as they do in Peru, but in the afternoon, on the promenade or when riding, they go bareheaded. The prevailing diseases are pneumonia and other throat and lung troubles, and during the winter the mortality from these causes is immense, but the Chilano persists in believing that artificial heat poisons the atmosphere, and when he visits the home of a foreigner, and finds a fire, he will ask that the door be left ajar so that he may be as chilly as usual. At fashionable gatherings, dinner parties and the like, women may be seen in full evening dress, with bare arms and shoulders, while the temperature of the room is between 40 and 50 degs. Fahrenheit.

Chicago's Millionaires.

Down to the present time Chicago's citizens have been occupied in acquiring wealth. There has been time for its enjoyment and interest, but enjoyment does not seem a prime motive. There are the Pullmans and the Farwells, the Fields, the McCormicks and others who have long been able to throw aside the cares of business and devote themselves exclusively to pleasure, but they have not done so. Marshall Field and the Farwells still manage the two greatest dry goods houses in the west. George M. Pullman is at the head of the mammoth Pullman Car company. There is a second generation of McCormicks, but the click of machinery still goes on monotonously in the reaper factory. When will these people imitate their brethren in New York, and, leaving their ancestral rooms, give themselves entirely to leading the pleasure gatherings of the fashionable people of their city?—Selected.

A FEW COUNTERFEITERS.

SHREWDNESS OF THE MEN WHO MAKE AND PASS BAD MONEY.

The Thirty Thousand Dollar Job of the Bonacos—The "Squealing" Trick of Miss Ogle—Great Cost of an Outfit and the Difficulty of Securing the Proper Paper.

One of the most curious stories of the operations of counterfeiters is that of Gaetano Russo and his wife Rosa. They were liberated from the Cambridge, Mass., jail in 1877, after a short term, and immediately went to London, England. There they sought an old acquaintance, Louie Orlando, an expert photographer and engraver, who photographed and engraved for them plates of a $5 and $1 silver certificate. With the plates they went to Paris, and there bought a press, ink and paper for 500 francs and printed $30,000. Having accomplished their work, they returned the press to its former owner, complaining that it did not work satisfactorily, and received back all its price except 50 francs charged for its use. Destroying the plates, they prepared to return.

Rosa Russo was required to carry the money. When she demurred Orlando and her husband threatened to kill her and she finally consented to sew the notes in sheets in a new gown constructed for that purpose. They arrived safely in London, but Rosa was so frightened at her narrow escape from discovery at the hands of the custom officers that she absolutely refused to be the medium for transporting the notes to America. While she was asleep Louie and Gaetano conformed her, took her money and jewelry, all the sheets of counterfeit, and skipped for America. They arrived safely in New York, but when they were about to begin operations Rosa appeared upon the scene and threatened an exposure unless she was taken in on an equal footing. She had borrowed money from an Italian friend in London and had taken the steamer which followed that in which Russo and Orlando sailed. Elaborate preparations were made for sharing the stuff. They had left London in November, 1877, and in June, 1888, were ready for a $30,000 transaction, so little time does it require to become rich by counterfeiting if one is not caught. Alas! before one month had passed, Gaetano and Rosa, Louie Orlando, August Russo and wife, Salvator Di Giovanni and Angelina, his wife, and Robert J. Traynor were arrested, speedily convicted and sentenced to terms of from four to twelve years.

Among the tricks of counterfeiters is to get off, or to secure a mitigation of sentence, by promising to give valuable information and possibly to betray the aberrations of other counterfeiters. In this way Miles Ogle pulled the wool over the eyes of so shrewd a district attorney as Bucher Swope of the western district of Pennsylvania. Miles was arrested in Pittsburg in 1878, and vowed to Swope that if let off on light bail he would give information that would result in the total abolition of counterfeiting, and having received Swope's promise, he gave out a issue of the so called secrets of counterfeiting, which sounded well, but amounted to nothing at all, and told in addition where a few small counterfeiters could be found. He forfeited his small bail, bought a farm near Lindenwald, and soon had on the market another dangerous counterfeit. In 1877, however, he and William Johnson, one of Swope's and Mayney's old friends, were arrested on their way from Cincinnati to Pittsburg with a valise in their possession containing plates and tools, convicted and sentenced to eight years in the Allegheny penitentiary.

Everybody knows the career of Brockway, the attorney, one of the most expert and instructing of counterfeiters, whose pardon was a year ago a matter of discussion on account of extreme ill health. Brockway's last counterfeit was so good that it was supposed to have been printed from a genuine plate.

Its appearance in quantity is practiced, and what amount of counterfeit money is in circulation, no one knows. An offender once caught is spotted forever after, and his career is full of danger. How many counterfeiters are engaged in the business who are never caught at all? What amount of counterfeit paper money and bogus coin is in circulation as yet unrecognized? A country which fill which is not particularly good may travel about for months and answer every purpose of good money in many hands before it reaches a taker who recognizes its spurious character. How long will a good counterfeit travel? With paper money the great obstacle in the way of successful counterfeiting is the expense of the plate. Each plate for a genuine bill costs about $2,000, and the cost of a counterfeit can hardly be less. Then there is the paper and paper and ink and tools for engraving, all expensive. No press ever captured has been of a kind on which good work was possible. All have been clumsy and primitive.

But are these all the implements at work? In a single possible shop are 100 presses grinding out counterfeit bills which are of the best manufacture for plate printing; the best possible presses are plants with geometric lathe, plate printing presses, operated by engravers and printers as expert as any in the land, of engraving and printing, with ink and paper indistinguishable from that used for genuine bills, turning out counterfeits by the million, which are as good as the genuine.

Ah, the silken thread woven in the genuine paper, you say.

Yes, on that little silk thread hangs a vast deal, but who knows if no imitation has been produced? Who knows the silk thread process is a secret? Let me tell you there are bills at the treasury, and other bills have been presented there, which have baffled the efforts of the most expert detectors in the country to tell whether they are genuine or bogus. The experts disagreed, and still disagree, experts of equal cunning.

The subject is a fascinating one, and the problem one which governments will be compelled to give more attention to in the future than in the past.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

The "ring" will seek a "vindication" at the polls next Monday, and will "move heaven and earth" to bring it about. Voters will undoubtedly be forced by their necessities to support the ring ticket, and woe unto the independent voter who dares to cast his vote against them; the fate of other poor men in the past will be repeated, and they will pack their "duds" the morning after election and take a walk.

Old fashioned "Deestrick Schule" entertainment in Lewis opera house, on Friday evening, March 21st; to be given by about fifty of the citizens of Charlevoix. Get ready for this novel and popular entertainment. Look for another notice next week.

The Flint & Pere Marquette steamship lines are doing a large amount of business between Milwaukee, Manitowoc and Ludington. Never before since the line was opened was there so much east bound freight handled. Five steamers are on the routes and can scarcely keep the warehouses clear at Milwaukee and Manitowoc. There is no ice to impede their passage.

In regard to the sudden deaths of the past week, there has been a conflict of reports as to the cause. Wherever there is a suspicion of diphtheria, the public should be given the benefit of every doubt. It is sad to isolate a family in time of affliction, but if there is a possible fear of contagion, other families should not be permitted to innocently expose themselves to the same affliction.

A Progressive Farmer.

Col O. T. Booth was a caller at this office Tuesday, and incidentally mentioned his farm on the Petoskey road. He called attention to the report in some portions of southern Michigan that this country would not raise decent crops of anything. He knew better. He had within a short time marketed spring wheat that overrun in weight of clean wheat 22 pounds in 50 bushels machine measure. He had sown barley in July and harvested over 30 bushels per acre of first-class grain. Last year he harvested over 40 acres of grain and every acre of it was good in quantity and quality. But he says he does not get it by skimming the top of the ground; he lets his plow down nine inches. He has a pair of oxen which he says will weigh 4,400, and they walk right along with a plow at the depth mentioned, and grubs and roots come come to the top and are soon disposed of. All his land, new and old, is thoroughly and carefully plowed. Just now he is giving some attention to the poultry business. He has an incubator now in operation that will hold 600 eggs, and other apparatus, houses, pens, etc., in proportion, and proposes to make a wholesale business of raising chickens for the market. He has already delivered a large quantity of fat poultry at a good profit, and by another season will expect to be multiply his business several times. All this he intentions to prove that this country will raise the best grain, notwithstanding the so-called long winters; and also to prove that other industries of the farm may be made profitable if entered into with well-directed, persistent effort. Long life to Col Booth.

Historical Society.

The storm last Friday night caused a small attendance and a short program at the meeting of the Historical Society. Piano solo, Lena Washburn; select reading, Alice Cochran; piano duet, Lizzie Lange and Bertie Wood; recitation, Winnie Barthod; piano duet, Mrs. Kane and Miss Coch ran. The next meeting will be with Mrs. L. E. Allen. Paper by Rev. W. H. McCartney, on "Growth of Religious Work."

Congregational Church.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

"That Examination."

EDITOR JOURNAL.—In the Sentinel's answer to my statement of facts, it is stated that I am not responsible for the article. Now I state here that every word in that article is mine. It is evident that the editor of the Sentinel is not aware that a blacksmith and engineer combined requires more brains than a man like himself. It is plain to any reader that he is weak swing, and wants to retreat under what he calls his "smoke." He does it by resorting to his old tactics—slang, ridicule, and mud-slinging. This has been his life-long study. It is all he uses for argument, and will, if he dismisses me as unworthy of notice. That is what the Sentinel has always done when getting the worst of a controversy. Again he retreats like a yelping cur. His statement of the question asked me at the examination is a falsehood, and he knows it; but he uses that with other false and misleading assertions to vent his spite against me. In order to divert public attention from the main issue, he refers in vile, vindictive language to some "Rev.," yet in doing so he proves nothing beyond his own command of invective, and a readiness to use it apparently bred by long familiarity with saloons and slums. I am not dismissed yet while there is a cur barking at my heels.

Current Comment

The Chicago Journal insists that "tariff reform" means democracy. That is true, as it is also true that "higher taxes" mean modern republicanism.

"What the Great Fair Should Be," is the subject of a very amusing paper by P. T. Barnum, in the March number of the North American Review. Needless to say, Mr. Barnum's views are original.

Hon. Perry Hannah, of Traverse City, in a recent interview said: The time is near at hand when hardwood will be far more profitable than pine has ever been. Pine has been so abundant in the past that hardwood has been wholly neglected.

Majo, Brown & Co., of Muskegon, have sold the steamer Van Raalte to the Garden City Sand and Gravel Company, of Chicago, for $8,000. She will be used with the other boats of that company to carry sand from the Manitou Islands to Chicago.

"Electric Lighting and Public Safety," is the subject of another article, by Geo. Westinghouse, Jr., in the March number of the North American Review. He controverts some of the statements made by Sir. Wm. Thomson in the previous number.

Six or eight miles of the C. & W. M. grading, next north of the Manistee river, is unfinished, and track laying will have to be suspended for a few weeks. The iron bridge across the Manistee river is well advanced, and all the work is in shape to be rapidly pushed as soon as spring opens.—Traverse Herald.

With the exception of the Glad stone-Blaine controversy, probably no more important contribution has ever been made to magazine literature than the two papers on "The Limitations of the Speakership," by the Speaker, Hon. T. B. Reed, and the ex-Speaker, Hon. J. G. Carlisle, both of which will appear in the March number of the North American Review.

Grover Cleveland has undoubtedly grown in the estimation of the people since leaving the white house. More than any other democrat in the United States does he dare express his real sentiments, and is undoubtedly the only democrat alive who would dare say as he said in Baltimore last Thursday, "I have never doubted in my own mind whether or not the removal of tariffs from the voter would injure or benefit the democratic party. Ballot reform is right. That's why it should be adopted."—Petoskey Record.

More towns die for want of confidence on the part of business men and lack public spirit than from any other cause. When a man in search of a home or business location goes into a town and finds everything brim full of hope and enthusiasm over the prospects of the place and all earnestly at work to build it up, he soon becomes imbued with the same spirit, and as a result he drives down his stakes and goes to work with the same interest. When, however, he goes to a town where everyone expresses doubt and apprehension for the future prospects of the place, moving about and indulging in mournful complaints (as naturally feels it is no place for him, and at once shakes the dust off his feet while he pulls out with all possible speed for some other place. Consequently try and make a live, enterprising town out of the one in which you live. When you are working for and saying a good thing for your own town you are accomplishing all the more for yourself.

Professor John Henry Comstock, the eminent naturalist, begins in the New York Ledger of March 1, a series of six articles on the study of insects, in which he describes, not only those insects which are useful to the farmer, but also, those which destroy entire fields of grain, cotton and rice, and ravage orchards, gardens and vineyards. He demonstrates how it was scientifically determined that an average annual loss of $200,000,000 has been occasioned in the South by the cotton-worm alone; and that an average loss per year, of nearly $2,400,000 has been brought about in the apple crop of Illinois by the ravages of the codlin moth. The series is profusely illustrated.

Scribner's.

Scribner's Magazine, after devoting its opening pages for several months to articles of practical interest and exploration, has, as its leading feature for March, a purely literary paper on Charles Lamb, who always commands the sympathetic interest of people who read. It also contains the concluding paper in Col. Church's remarkable study of Ericsson's career; a brief description of the Australian Boomerang; a striking summary of the recent wonderful French experiments in hypnotism; a picturesque account of the remnant of Seminoles who live in the Everglades of Florida; dramatic chapters in the two illustrated serials, and a good short story, poems, and "The Point of View," the new department. Six of the articles are illustrated.

Eating the First Oyster.

It has been often said that he must have been a bold man who first ate an oyster. This is said in ignorance of the legend which assigns the first act of oyster eating to a very natural cause.

It is related that a man, walking one day, picked up one of these savory bivalves just as it was in the act of gaping. Observing the extreme smoothness of the interior of the shells, he insinuated his finger between them that he might feel their shining surface, when suddenly they closed upon the exploring digit with a sensation less pleasurable than he anticipated.

The prompt withdrawal of his finger was scarcely a more natural movement than its transfer to his mouth. It is not very clear why people when they hurt their fingers put them into their mouths; but it is very certain that they do; and in this case the result was more fortunate.

The owner of the finger tasted oyster juice for the first time, as the Chinaman in Elia's essay having burnt his finger first tasted crackling. The savor was delicious; he had made a great discovery; so he picked up the oysters, forced open the shells, banqueted upon their contents, and soon brought oyster eating into fashion.

And, unlike most fashions, it has never gone, and is never likely to go out.—Yankee Blade.

The Electric Candle Cure.

A subscriber at Bryan, O., recently sent The Electrical World the following dialogue, which he overheard in the street:

"Howdy do, howdy do?"

"Oh, fair to middlin'; folks all well, but I have got a touch of rheumatic."

"Oh, you can get rid of that; I had it so bad I couldn't raise my hand to take a chaw tobacker, but it's gone now."

"What did you take for it?"

"Waal, when they put up them lectric lights I got one of their candles they had dropped, and carry it in my pocket. You know lectricity is good for medicine. Waal, there is enough lecticity left in the candle when they put them out that some will soak into you, and that knocks it every time. Jest try it."

"I will; where can I get one?"

"I've got a couple; take one."

"I'm much obliged; I'll give it a chance."

Epoch.

The transition from long lingering and painful sickness to robust health marks an epoch in the life of the individual. Such a remarkable event is treasured in the memory and the agency whereby the good health has been attained is gratefully blessed. Hence it is that so much has been made of Electric Bitters, so many feel they owe their restoration to health to the use of the great alterative and tonic. If you are troubled with any disease of kidneys, liver or stomach, of long or short standing you will surely find relief by use of Electric Bitters. Sold at 50c. and $1 per bottle at F. G. Hines & Co.'s drug store. 3

A RUSSIAN LEGEND.

The Russian peasants tell today
A legend old and dear to them,
How, when the wise men went their way
To find the babe at Bethlehem,

They paused to let their camels rest
Beside a peasant's lowly door;
And all intent upon their quest
They failed their sacred errand o'er.

"Come with us," and the eager three
Urged one with us the Heavenly Child;
What prowler hence can there be
For mortals, sinful and defiled?

"And bid each child to Sunday clothes
Bring of his treasure, rich or poor,
Bodes of myrrh and wildest dows,
With ointment for the Christ Child's sake,

"Who knows what blessing may befall
If they but touch his garment's hem?
And only once for them and all
Will Christ be born in Bethlehem."

"Alas! I have so much to do,"
The mother answered with a sigh;
"I cannot journey now with you.
But I will follow by and by."

The wise men frowned and rode away,
Leaving the children all alone,
And pleading through the long day
"When may we go? When may we go?"

And while their cheeks flushed rosy red,
They shouted in a chorus sweet,
"And may we touch his pretty head?
And may we kiss his blessed feet?"

But women still will bake and brew,
No matter what sweet lessons sing
And petty tasks they still must do,
Though angels tarry at the door!

And when the frocks are sewn with lace,
And laid with ribbons smart and trim;
When each our stained and tired face
Was bathed and laid its hood within,

When the small room were cheery sways
And chairs set primly in a row,
Beckoning a home well kept,
Then wearily she turned to go.

The sky was purpling in the west.
The eager night was hurrying on;
The three wise men had onward pressed,
The star from out the east had gone!

What could the foolish mother do?
She turned her footsteps home again;
And never, all her and life through,
Did she behold its three wise men.

Alas! Through weak disobeying, she
Her sweetest privilege had missed;
So did her children never see
The Holy Babe they might have kissed.

—Mary Riley Smith.

CROSS CURRENTS.

"You are such a very independent creature."

"I am not a creature, but an able bodied woman, with all my wits about me. Why should I make believe to be the weak kneed specimen of feminine foolishness that is your ideal woman?"

"Oh, never mind me, do just as you like," cried Mr. Bartlett, testily, as a voice from the inner room called, "What are you two quarreling about now?"

"It is only Mr. Bartlett talking nonsense, mother," said Agnes, gayly; "he thinks I can't go up to town for a day's shopping without a chaperon."

"Is that all? Why, my dear Gus, Agnes always goes alone and safely. Indeed, there is no one to go with her, so she has to, she has never come to any harm yet," and Mrs. Oldham looked sympathingly from her sofa.

Mr. Bartlett promptly subsided, as he always did, when any remark of his had brought Mrs. Oldham's poverty into full view. Neither Agnes nor her mother ever troubled themselves about the narrowness of their income, but it was a painful subject to Gus, who would willingly have shared his abundance with them. He returned to the charge an hour later, when he and Agnes were out in the garden.

"You might let me come with you tomorrow," he said, persuasively; "I could see you over the crossings, at any rate.

"Oh, the policeman does that," answered Agnes, merrily. "You are trying to know what I do with myself, of course, but I don't mean to encourage you in inquisitiveness, and I shall go alone."

"I wish to goodness you had some one to look after you," growled the young man. "Don't you think, for your mother's sake, you could put up with me?" he went on, in a pleading tone.

"That is either the third or fourth time that you have proposed to me in the last month," said Miss Oldham, calmly. "If you do it again before Christmas I will have you bound over to keep the peace."

"You do not know how cruel you are," I am quite in earnest."

"So am I! I may marry some day, but it, or perhaps I ought to say he, won't be you. So be a sensible boy, Gus, and have off sentiment. It does not suit your figure," Agnes laughed, saucily, chievously.

Gus was used to snubbing, and here it with a fair amount of fortitude. He and Agnes had been playfellows since childhood, and he had, to be timed, fallen in love with her on his return from Oxford. He had lately got into a habit of proposing or half proposing to her after every one of her numerous squabbles, and always met with the same laughed, but unqualified refusal. Agnes looked on him as a brother, and was extremely fond of him, but Gus Barton was not the sort of man to inspire a clever, practical woman with any deep sentiment, and she could never even take his devotion seriously, which was depressing for Gus.

"Florrie, allow me to introduce our squire, Mr. Augustus Bartlett of that ilk—Miss Marsh, Gus!" and Agnes finished the introduction with a sweeping curtsey.

Mr. Bartlett looked distressed. "I did not know you were bringing a friend down," he said, "and I've only got the dog cart here. I suppose you had better drive, and let me walk!" he added.

"Should you be very much surprised if you heard that the greengrocer's cart is waiting for Miss Marsh's luggage?" cried Agnes. "I would have told you she was coming, only you were so disagreeable yesterday. We can pack in the dog cart all right," and so they did.

Gus invariably met Agnes at the station when she returned from her visits to London, but on this occasion he was much astonished, for she had never brought a friend back with her before, and this friend was both pretty and charming. She very much enlivened the evening at the cottage, whither Gus strolled as usual after dinner, and, generally speaking, made a good impression on her friends; but for all that Mr. Bartlett was not quite happy in her society. He could not help thinking that there must be something uncanny in her sudden appearance, or else (and this brilliant idea rather took his fancy) Agnes had brought her down for him to fall in love with.

"Just as if anything, or anybody, could make me give up Aggie!" he thought to himself as he went homewards. "It would serve her right if I did have a little flirtation;" then, as a brilliant idea struck him, "I declare, I'll ask Nugent down, and he can look after Miss Marsh while I take care of Aggie." Which determination was promptly acted on, for Gus wrote a letter that night, and sent it off by early post as soon as he came down the following morning.

"What do you think of our squire, Flo?"

"Fine, well grown young man, with a restful absence of ideas," answered Miss Marsh, carelessly.

"He has some ideas, but they are mainly practical," said Agnes. "He is an excellent landlord, besides being a dear good boy, but he certainly is not brilliant."

"How does he come to reign all alone in this forlorn way?" inquired Florrie. "Has he no belongings?"

"None to speak of. His mother died when he was a baby, his father three years ago. I think mamma looked after him more than any one else, though he has some aunts and cousins. He and I are just like brother and sister."

"That must be rather pleasant, as you have no proper brother. Why, surely, that is he coming up the lane? And there is some one with him! Fancy finding two young men in a country village like this!"

Miss Marsh had been at the cottage three days, and was enjoying the fresh country air thoroughly; and having a keen interest in her fellow creatures, she had been studying Gus because there was no one else to study. Now her attention was distracted by the new comer, who was, indeed, a very agreeable and interesting specimen of humanity.

Richard Nugent had been at college with Gus, but had been far more successful in the schools, and less in the cricket grounds, than his friend. Now he was a hard working London curate, while Gus was enjoying the less laborious position of a wealthy country gentleman, but their friendship was as great as ever.

"Mrs. Oldham, will you come up to the Grange to-morrow?" said Gus one afternoon, as he lay on the grass at her feet. "Nugent and I want to have some tennis with the girls, and you can look on and chaperon.

"Very well, I will come with pleasure, but you must send the pony carriage for me, you know."

"Of course; send for you and send you back. You will stay to dinner, won't you?"

"You must consult the girls about that," said Mrs. Oldham, "for I have an idea that they may be busy; they are reading together a good deal, you know."

"Miss Marsh went in to write letters, didn't she? I don't know where Agnes has gone," remarked the young man, rising from his lazy attitude and looking about him. "Oh, there she is, with Nugent, right at the top end of the field. How can people be so energetic this weather?"

Agnes and Mr. Nugent did not seem to find the heat oppressive; they are strolling quietly along the shady side of the field, talking, and were so much interested in their conversation that it was quite a long time before they returned to the lawn. Agnes was hearing of a world that was new and strange to her, but which seemed the exact thing she had desired for years.

In the quiet village there was but little for an energetic woman to do; but the life Mr. Nugent spoke of had opportunities for every one. Real hard self denying labor among the poor, depressing at times, but cheered and lightened by the fellow feeling of many workers, all struggling towards a noble and worthy aim, was the very work she would have chosen had the choice been given her. Now she heard of it from one of the workers, and her face glowed with enthusiasm as she listened, while Mr. Nugent could not help longing to have such a ready sympathy and appreciation near him to soothe and cheer him in his troubles and disappointments which were a necessary accompaniment of the work.

"Why don't you come to London and work with us, Miss Oldham?" he asked. "You have strength and energy. Why waste them on trifles when you might be doing real good with them?"

"I don't think my mother could live in London," said the girl, slowly, "and I could not afford it, either. But I shall work some day, and meanwhile, I dare say, it is good to have to exercise patience. And I am young enough as yet," she added, with a smile, as they returned to the lawn to join the others.

The afternoon at the Grange was a success. Mrs. Oldham sat in a low chair under a great cedar tree, and enjoyed herself quietly; indeed, the view and the sight of the four merry young people was pleasure enough for her. The tennis court was a very good one, and Gus and Florrie played Mr. Nugent and Agnes with great effect. When they were tired Florrie insisted on being taken all over the house, and gave the master of it intense pleasure by the interest she took in his old pictures, china, furniture and curios generally.

"You can't think what a pleasure this is to me!" she said, when they were examining some exquisite wood carving in the drawing room. "We London people live in stucco houses, and buy our artistic properties in Regent street, but here they are all growing, so to speak."

"Everything here has grown with the place, if that is what you mean," replied Gus. "There is nothing modern, and everything has a history. My people have lived here since Queen Elizabeth's time, and though we aren't either rich or clever, at any rate we are not mushrooms."

"Why should you be rich?" asked Florrie. "If you were a millionaire this house would not be grand enough for you, and you would spoil it by altering it, whereas now it is perfect."

Gus was pleased. He loved his home and all his ancestral treasures heartily. He loved all the old associations which had grown up in the 300 years since the Grange was built, and he was well aware that there were few families in England who could boast of such a line of worthy gentlemen as those from whom he was descended. Agnes did not care for any of these things, and was at that moment having a long conversation with Mr. Nugent about the evil results of foreign immigration in the east of London, a subject which interested her, but which Gus simply did not understand. He was satisfied if his tenants and laborers were well housed and fairly prosperous (and it must be owned that he was an admirable landlord), but the distress he did not see had no pulse for him; it was no business of his, and he lacked the imagination which brought it all vividly before the energetic couple under the cedar tree.

That evening Agnes stood at her window and looked out on the peaceful moonlit fields, and longed to be in the busy human hive she had been hearing about. Then her face dimpled into a merry smile.

"Dear old Gus!" she said, "he has fallen into the trap, and they will be thoroughly happy. I don't think I know any one so fitted to be his wife as Flo."

Meanwhile Mr. Bartlett was thinking what a very successful day it had been, and how nice it was to get Agnes up to the Grange; and it never dawned on his innocent mind that he had invited just a dozen words with her the whole afternoon.

"So you really go to morrow," said Gus, as he and his friend sat smoking, the last evening of Mr. Nugent's visit. "We shall miss you very much, old fellow, but you must come again."

"I should like it above everything," was Mr. Nugent's answer. "If I can get away for a few days in the winter, will you have me?"

"Shall be delighted; come as soon as you can, and stay as long as you can. One thing you must come for, and I hope it is not very far distant now," proceeded Mr. Bartlett, with something very like a blush.

"What is that?"

"My wedding!!"

"My dear boy, I'm delighted to hear it, but I did not know that you had got to that point yet," cried the clergyman, who had watched his friend's first course with Miss Marsh with strong approval.

"Well, that's the thing! I don't know what comes over girls, but though I have asked her half a dozen times, she has not said 'Yes' yet," replied the unconscious Gus.

"You have certainly lost no time," said his friend; "perhaps she thinks she ought to know you better."

"I don't know how she is to do that, considering that we have known each other all our lives, and lived close to each other, too."

"But she only came here just before I did," exclaimed Mr. Nugent, "or I am mistaken. Don't you mean Miss Marsh?"

A sudden light glowed on Gus' face; then faded as rapidly as it had come. "No! I don't mean Miss Marsh," he said slowly. "I never thought about her; I have always intended to marry Agnes."

It was Mr. Nugent's turn to look puzzled. "I am glad you told me that," he said, "for I was entirely mistaken. I thought from your manner with her that you cared for Miss Marsh, not Miss Oldham; and it was just as well, perhaps, that you undeceived me."

"I won't spoil the dear lad's happiness," he thought, an hour later, when he was alone; "and yet, who would have guessed it? I thought she was free, and that he cared for the other girl. I suppose she was only civil to me because I am his friend," and he bestow himself to bed, and, after a night's tossing and tumbling, went back to London by the early morning train, without taking a formal farewell of the ladies of the Cottage.

Agnes was angry, very angry; she had been most cavalierly treated, as she considered, and longed for some one on whom to vent her ire.

"What did he mean by running away without even a word of thanks for the civility they had shown him? He must have thought she was making eyes at him—just as if she cared a fig about him, or looked upon him from any other point of view than that of a guide to the East of London! How horribly conceited men are! Oh, there comes Gus! he might have left us alone for one day," and she went to open the door, and quarrel with him there if possible. Gus was a little bit cross, too, for Florrie had had to join her relations in Normandy, and he and the Oldhams were left alone, and things were flat in consequence, though he fancied he should like it.

"It's very nice being together again, isn't it, Aggie?" he said as he entered.

"I don't think so at all," she answered promptly. "I dare say you don't miss Mr. Nugent, but I am very dull without Florrie, and so are you, I should say, the way she proceeded, rather spitefully.

"I only want you, as you know," he said, not as pleasantly as usual. "Nugent has promised to come and marry us, and I really think you might make up your mind to it soon."

"Marry you! Never! I have told you so a dozen times at least" (which was an exaggeration) "and now, after flirting with Florrie all the summer, you have the impertinence to ask me again, and to ask Mr. Nugent to marry us, just as if we were engaged. I don't wonder he went away! I'm not surprised at all now!" and Agnes suddenly flung herself on the sofa and burst into tears.

As to Gus, he stood and gazed at her, open mouthed. For one thing, he had never seen her cry since she was a tiny child; for another, a new idea had penetrated his slow brain, and the world seemed upside down.

"Florrie! had he flirted with her? No, he had only been blind. He had had a strange new feeling for some time which had alternately made him happy and miserable, and which must have been—"

Here his meditations were interrupted by Agnes, who had left off crying and recovered her temper.

"Don't stand there with your mouth hanging open, Gus!" she cried; "you do look so silly. Just make up your mind, once and for all, which of us you really care for, and take the next cab for Hippe. The Marshes will be there till the end of the week."

Mr. Bartlett took her advice, and a few days later Mr. Nugent, who was trying to work off his bitter disappointment, got a letter from Dieppe with the astonishing intelligence that Gus and Florrie were engaged, and that his friend's affection for Agnes was of a totally different kind to what he had been led to believe. "In fact," the letter concluded, "Agnes knew me better than I did myself, and was perfectly right when she brought dear Flo down to stay with us. I know I don't forget that you have promised to marry us."

Hard work was very pleasant to Mr. Nugent that winter; he threw himself into all the multifarious duties of a town parson, with an energy which had its root in a happy heart. To be sure, nothing had been said or settled, but for all that he knew well enough that he would not be working alone for long, and then those two Gus' wedding to look forward to. Before the wedding came if his prospects had a very satisfactory change, for Gus was not long instead of curate that he asked Agnes to be his wife.

"We shall have work enough, and to spare," he told her, when the momentous question had been answered, "but you will be there and help me, will you, my darling?"

To which Agnes answered something about staying with him, which cannot be publicly repeated.—Chambers' Journal.

Did Joanne d'Arc Burn?

The reproduction, with Sarah Bernhardt in the leading role, of the play of "Joanne d'Arc," in Paris, has been occasion for a renewal of the old controversy as to whether Joanne was ever really burned at the stake or whether her place was not taken by some one else and she set free. One M. Lesigne has brought together in a book all the facts tending to show that Joanne never was burned, and that she actually married a country gentleman in Lorraine and caused a family to be born from them were direct descendants as late as a century ago.

The stories were first put into circulation in 1803 in a publication called Mercure Galant, and were based upon discoveries made by a certain Father Ignace among some old manuscripts in Metz. The first document was a record of the visit of Joanne, the Maid of Orleans, to her relatives in that city, and subsequently there was discovered a marriage contract of Robert des Armoises with "Jeanne d'Arc, the Maid of Orleans," the marriage having taken place at Arlon, where the Duchess Elizabeth of Luxembourg made a splendid fete of the occasion.

The bed in which she "Maid" and her husband conveyed certain land was also found, and subsequently at Orleans in the public archives there were discovered various entries in the public accounts that went to show that something had been paid to her or for her to her relatives at various times after she was supposed to have been burned at the stake. These documents have made it absolutely certain that somebody who was known as "Jeanne d'Arc" and "The Maid of Orleans" was living and somewhat of a public character for many years after the original Joanne had presumably been reduced to ashes. The appearance of the original Joanne, however, insist that the woman to whom the documents refer must have been a different one, either an impostor or a woman whom some confusion of identity had arisen among the people of her acquaintance to designate by the title of the dead heroine.—New York Sun.

An Ancient Toy.

In the Sixteenth century Regiomantanus made an iron fly which moved about in the room and buzzed as long as it was wound up. Afterward an ambassador came with a wooden fly, which he said he had received from the Emperor Maximilian at Nuremburg, flew forth to meet him.

But one of the most wonderful of such things of which we have record was a group of automata constructed by Philip Camuz for Louis XIV. This consisted of a wood cut of a fig about him, or locked upon him from any other point of view than that of a guide to the East of London! How horribly conceited men were! Oh, there comes Gus! he might have left us alone for one day," and she went to open the door, and quarrel with him there if possible. "It's very nice being together again, isn't it, Aggie?" he said as he entered.

"I don't think so at all," she answered promptly. "I dare say you don't miss Mr. N'gent, but I am very dull without Florrie, and so are you, I should say, the way she proceeded, rather spitefully.

"I only want you, as you know," he said, not as pleasantly as usual. "Nugent has promised to come and marry us, and I really think you might make up your mind to it soon."

"Marry you! Never! I have told you so a dozen times at least" (which was an exaggeration) "and now, after flirting with Florrie all the summer, you have the impertinence to ask me again, and to ask Mr. Nugent to marry us, just as if we were engaged. CRAZY FOR SUBSIDIES.

SOME PERTINENT REMARKS ON AN IMPORTANT SUBJECT.

Hungry Lobbyists Trying to Revive American Shipping—Same for the Taxpayers to Think Of—Blaine vs. New on the British Way of Doing It.

A bill has been introduced in congress by Mr. Farquhar, of New York, for the purpose of reviving American shipping by means of subsidies. The bill proposes a subsidy to American built vessels of thirty cents per ton for every thousand miles sailed. A lobby has been at work in Washington to show how our declining merchant marine would be put upon its feet again by the passage of this bill.

Of course it is the men who would get the money who are pushing for the passage of the measure. Mr. H. K. Thurber, president of the Brazil Mail Steamship company, and Mr. J. M. Ludlam, general manager of that line, have been before the house committee to show how good a thing it would be for the country to pay them for doing their own business. If the bill should be passed, the 3,000 steamship of Mr. Thurber's line would receive about $90,000 per year for trade between the ports of New York and Rio de Janeiro and a 5,000 ton vessel would receive about $150,000 annually for the round voyage between New York and Liverpool.

If such a steamship should make only twelve round voyages to Liverpool in a year her share of the subsidy for this single vessel not less than $110,000 a year, which would amount to the interest at 5 per cent on $2,200,000.

Evidently the subsidy men know what they want.

Mr. F. B. Crawford, on the other hand, has written a letter to The Manufacturer of Philadelphia showing what a burden to the taxpayers this subsidy scheme would become. Mr. Crawford thinks and says reasonably—that if we undertake to grant subsidies we ought to aim, at the very least, to make our steam shipping half as great as that of Great Britain. If it should have that effect, then, our each steamer traversed 30,000 miles per annum (a low estimate) and received 30 cents per ton green as proposed by the bounty bill) per 1,000 miles, the annual cost would be about $41,000,000.

With figures like these kept before the American taxpayer, how long do these subsidy hunters think they could be able to keep the taxpayer up to the scratch of voting their annual bills? Of course, with these munificent sums going every year into the coffers of the subsidized ship owners, these men could become very promising subjects for "fat frying," and the growing needs of the G. O. P. would render the creation of a working class of ship owners most desirable at this particular time, when there is a growing tendency among manufacturers and members of congress to remove their shackles by giving them free raw material.

The argument of the subsidy hunters is one of the queerest things that American politics—with its many queer phenomena—has exhibited for many years.

The example of England!

The men who have been filling the air for years with exclamations of horror at British free trade, and who have diligently circulated forged extracts from English newspapers to frighten American workingmen, now rave about, all of a sudden, and plead the example of England!

What what are the fools!

The best Republican authorities are not agreed.

Mr. Blaine says: "England has never been affrighted by the word subsidy," and he mentions a trifling number to show that England has built up her commercial marine by granting subsidies.

Gen. John C. New, President Harrison's consul general at London, reports to the United States treasury department, under date of Sept. 3, 1889, that "the British government does not grant subsidies, in the general sense of that term, to any steamship company."

The fact is that not more than 2 per cent. of England's shipping receives money in any way from the government. Some owners are paid small sums by the British admiralty on condition that their ships be built so as to carry heavy guns, and that the government have the option of buying or hiring these vessels in time of war. The estimated expenditures for this purpose last year were only £39,380, or about $190,000.

Then England has the carriage of her mails; but she is often provokingly careless as to the compensation. For example, a French company holds the contract for carrying the British mails from Aden, in Arabia, to the island of Mauritius—both Aden and Mauritius belong to Britain.

Would not the subsidy hunters be more consistent and state their case more effectively if they should first by their old argument, which serves them so well in other fields, show England that they, therefore, we must do the opposite?

President Harrison, in his long and almost positless message, does at least manage to get up courage to advise the adoption of a policy, under the form of liberal appropriations, for carrying the mails. But applying this to the Brazil line, which seems to be the favorite and to cry the loudest of all the subsidy hunters, who wants to send letters to Brazil by that line, when it can be quicker and to cry the loudest of all the subsidy hunters, who wants to send letters to Brazil by that line, when it can be quicker and to cry the loudest of all the subsidy hunters, who wants to send letters to Brazil by that line, when it can be quicker and cheaper to go all the way by England and thus reach Brazil in twenty-three days?

But have we no shipping?

Much more, at least, than the flags on the seas indicate.

The fast steamers, the great "ocean greyhounds" plying between New York and Liverpool, are largely owned by American stockholders, but they are included in the royal naval reserve of England, and in case of war they would become British cruisers.

There is a firm in Boston which carries on a large trade in fruits with Jamaica, but it is forced to sail its vessels under the British flag. A wealthy capitalist of Boston owns a ship which he is forced to sail under the flag of the Hawaiian Islands.

The moral is plain.

Let our ship owners enter their vessels for American registry, from whatever source they procure them.

When this is done, Nellie Bly will not be able, after encircling the globe the next time, to report again that she did not once see the Stars and Stripes at the masthead of a ship all the way from Hong Kong to Canton in China.

DIFFERENT POLICY.

Two Examples from South America of How Shipping May Be Built Up.

There is another United States in South America, of which the Indians of Panama forms a part. This is a country in which vast forests of the choicest timber abound, and the country varies from the tropical palms to the lofty Andes. There are also coal and mineral resources, such as copper, lead and iron, and the precious metals are abundant.

Although the United States of Colombia has been nearly all of its revenue through tariff duties, still its law makers do not go to the length of refusing to let the citizens of that country buy their ships abroad and enter them for registry in Colombian vessels. They have not yet learned that way of building up home enterprises.

Accordingly we hear of a Pittsburg firm which is building two light draught steam wheel steamers for use on Colombian rivers.

We do not learn that there are any live Colombian statesmen who would like to refuse entry to these vessels.

Evidently the peculiar type of statesmanship which prevails with us has few imitators in this backward South American state, and the example of our own country as the leading American nation has not been properly presented to these old Spanish fogies of the tropics.

How is it that these men are so dull of perception as not to see that the true and only way to develop Colombian ship building is to shut out these Pittsburg river steamers? The Cauca and the Magdalena rivers of Colombia—are they not better than all the rivers of Pennsylvania?

At the same time another dispatch from Pittsburg, which states that the government of that country will shortly take steps to reduce materially the duties on raw materials in order to encourage Chilian manufacturing enterprises.

These persons seem to make a great mistake when they assert that the prestige of the United states will make it from this time forth the model of all our southern sister republics.

On the other hand, it seems clear that the South American delegates to the Washington congress did not come up here to learn political wisdom from us.

How little the Chilians are disposed to follow our example as the leading nation is further illustrated by an occurrence which happened some years ago. A commission was sent from this country to South America to effect reciprocity treaties with the various nations of that continent. When the commission came to Chili they had a hearing with the president of the republic.

But what did they accomplish?

The Chilian president told the commissioners some things which must have struck them as founded on very queer and even heretical principles of political economy.

This is what he said:

"It is out of no want of respect for the United States, but it is my settled belief that all treaties are endless. There can be no control by any convention of the laws of trade. Men will buy and sell where it is most to their advantage, and this cannot be aided or materially influenced by national treaties. Chili opens all her coasts to the vessels of any nation, the United States included, and in turn the Chilian flag ought to have access to the ports of the United States on the same terms.

The commission accomplished nothing, and reported that of course it was not worth while to dwell upon this avowal."

TARIFF NOTES.

Josiah R. Markley and Amos L. Ebert, two farmers of Montgomery, county, Pa., the latter of whom was last year a candidate for the Republican nomination for sheriff, have recently failed.

There has been another large failure in the woolen manufacturing business. This time the tariff lightning has struck Philadelphia to the extent of $300,000.

The starch makers have held a meeting at Buffalo to organize a starch trust. They want a tax of a duty of from 2 to 2½ cents a pound.

A large number of New England manufacturers of iron and steel have petitioned congress to remove all duties on iron, coal and coke, and to reduce the duties on pig iron, scrap iron and scrap steel to 24 per cent. ad valorem.

The United States senate has refused to include the statistics of farm mortgages in the census to be taken this summer. Is it because light on this subject would produce a stampede among the farmers for a reduction of tariff taxes?

There has been great opposition among the innovative merchants of New York to the Kinley bill for regulating the collection of customs. One authority estimates that the bill would damage the foreign commerce of that city to the extent of $200,000,000 annually. The New York Commercial Bulletin, which is a nonpartisan paper, says that the bill appears to have been framed with the intention of destroying the import trade of the country.

David A. Wells, the greatest statistician of the United states, estimates that the additional cost to this country of steel during the ten years from 1878 to 1887 in consequence of the tariff was $140,000,000.

Self Devouring.

A strange and really dramatic situation is one described by the author of "Obeah," a little book which treats of West Indian life. Insects and reptiles are abundant in the West Indies, and one soon gets well acquainted with certain kinds which are perfectly harmless and very lively. These little creatures are quite tame and when caught by the tail they slip away, leaving that appendage behind them.

I was once sitting in the veranda, watching a little green lizard darting about after the flies. It became bold, and in one of its quick movements came too near a large black and yellow spider, and caught the little fellow by the tail. Giving a wriggle, he darted off, leaving the spider in equal alarm for my lizard, and, having no use for it, I let it go. It ran the floor and resumed my book.

Presently I looked down and saw that a lot of ants had found the piece of tail, and were hurrying off with their treasure as fast as they could. When they had dragged it almost to their hole I noticed my little green friend, a few yards away, intently eying his missing property. The ants were just giving a final pull toward their nest, when the lizard suddenly made a dart upon them, seized his bit of tail, and swallowed it with evident gusto.

The Violin Makers.

In Martinichaus, with its surrounding villages, Klingenthal, Fleissen, Rohrbach and Graslitz, in Saxony, are about fifteen thousand people who do nothing else, day after day, but make violins. The inhabitants, from the little urchin to the old gray headed man, the small girl and the old grandmother, all are engaged in making some part of a violin. A good instrument consists of sixty-two different pieces. The older men make the finger board from ebony, and the string holder or the screws. The small boys make themselves useful by looking after the glue pot. A man with steady hands and a clear eye puts the different pieces together, and this is the most difficult task of all. The varnishing is generally done by women polishers, and the family that has a violin to finish is a good polisher is considered fortunate. Even a young man, when he goes a-wooing, inquires whether the young girl is a good polisher; and if she is, it certainly will increase his affection for her at least twofold. The polishing takes a good deal of time, some of the best violins being twenty and even thirty times polished. Every family has its peculiar style of polishing, and they never vary from that. There is one that makes nothing but a dark color, another a citron color, yet another an orange color, and so on.—Letter in Boston Transcript.

American Printing.

Do you know there are 12,000 papers, magazines, etc., published in the United States, that there are over 62,000 editors, 4,000 of them females, employed in publishing establishments, and that many of the 17,000 professional writers are of country are practical printers? The most powerful political of the times on which the genius of the middle ages was the hard and rough boards, which are perfectly harmless and very lively. These little creatures are quite tame and when caught by the tail they slip away, leaving that appendage behind them.

It is a boon of unqualified good, its possession is entirely beneficial, for it has taken the place of the rude, and has supplied our empiricals, and given a new impetus to thought and increased activity to our powers. It has raised our high scale of thinking beings, has enlarged the limits of our reasons, added to the dignity of our nature by giving birth to public opinion, and now man is no longer content if he does not know all the news and have daily information about the human race.—New Orleans Picayune.

An Alarm Bottle for Poisons.

A Chicago man has invented a bottle superior to the ordinary bottle for poisons. The superiority over the old fashioned article lies in the construction of the stopper. The projection which enters the neck of the bottle is ground glass, with a small hole in one side, through which protrudes a little rod of cork. The top of the stopper is covered with a thin piece of rubber, the edges of which are so arranged that when the stopper is removed the bell will ring. When it is replaced the rod, or plunger, again, may be turned to its place in the bottle it again sounds an alarm. The mechanism is so arranged that it is absolutely impossible to remove or replace the stopper without ringing the bell. The inventor says it is possible for a druggist, if he is careful in his business, and has no deal out poison in the place of harmless drugs without receiving a warning as to the dangerous nature of the preparation.—Chicago News.

Current Comment.

It is said that A. P. Swineford will start a red-hot democratic paper in Marquette the coming summer.

The Belford Company, publishers, of New York, are soon to issue a book, to be sold by subscription, entitled "Jefferson Davis, ex-president of the confederate states; a Memoir, by his wife."

The readers of "Looking Backward" will turn with eagerness to the reply which Edward Bellamy makes to the criticisms of Gen. Francis A. Walker, in the March number of the North American Review.

Another chapter in the Gladstone Blaine controversy is added by senator J. S. Morrill, in the March number of the North American Review, which also contains an article on the "Questions Club and the Tariff," by the Secretary of the United Questions Club of Massachusetts.

Max O'Rell was recently invited to write an article for the North American Review on the subject of "Comic Journalism in America." "That means all your journals," he replied, "for they are all comic." Under the title of "Lively Journalism," he, however, contributes an article to the March number of the Review.

The Michigan Tradesman has been changed to a four-column paper of 16 pages, stitched and trimmed. The change is decidedly for the better. It is convenient for handling, reading, filing, binding, and the paper can be increased in size to suit convenience or necessity by adding pages. It is the best possible style for a publication of the character of the Tradesman.

Cook Book No. 2, given as a premium to all advance subscribers of the Grand Traverse Herald, is a book of 112 pages, and contains a choice assortment of recipes for every-day cooking. It is an improvement over book 1 and will be appreciated by the thorough housekeeper. All husbands in the Traverse Region will give Mrs. Bates, the compiler, a vote of thanks for the genuine improvement in cooking on account of this work.

The bond is issued to provide (1) for the cancellation of the series of divisional bonds; (2) for the purchase of the Toledo, Ann Arbor & Lake Michigan, Railroad and for the construction or purchase of such lines of railroads as may from time to time be deemed necessary by the board of directors and stockholders: the establishment of a line of steamers and barges across Lake Michigan, the construction of the necessary docks and terminals on Lake Michigan, for the construction of additional terminals at Toledo and for the purchase of the necessary rolling stock. The counties in which the mortgage is to be filed are Lucas (Ohio), Monroe, Wastenaw, Wayne, Livingston, Shiawassee, Clinton, Gratiot, Isabella, Clare, Osceola, Wexford, Missaukee, Maristee, Benzie, Grand Traverse, Leelanaw, Kalkaska, Antrim, Charlevoix, Emmet, Saginaw, Bay and Genesee.

Fabulous Prices Paid for Orchids.

These flowers are as costly as they are wonderful, and they are not only curious and extremely rare, but the blossoms, when cut off, will say fresh for two weeks. Single blossoms have been sold for $25 to $50, while the value of the plants range from $100 to $1,000 each. Four of the most prominent Orchid growing houses in the United States will make large competitive exhibition at the Detroit Floral exhibition, April 22-26. The Detroit Journal is sparing no pains to insure to lovers of flowers a rare treat. No such exhibition of Orchids has ever been held in Michigan.

THAT ENGLISH MUMMY.

A RESPECTABLE RIVAL OF THE EGYPTIAN ARTICLE.

Bald, but Otherwise Perfect—Two Hundred Years Dead—A Famous Place of Worship—The Mummy in His Case. Why They Jabbed It.

It seems more than curious that his history has not been written. It is simply extraordinary that even his place of residence is known to so few among the many thousands who pass and repass it every day. It is true that for about one hundred and fifty years he was secluded from the world, in fact, dead to it; but for forty years he has been upon exhibition. For forty years he has been a subject of great interest to a comparatively small circle, and during that period he has never shown signs of temper even under circumstances that might be warranted to ruffle the composure of a "bearded lady" at a circus. In various parts of the United Kingdom the mere fact of having been born a century ago is considered sufficient to account for any quantity of notoriety. Yet in this article the intention is to tell something about a person who was born, probably, two centuries ago, and who, if can be easily proved, has not in forty years moved a muscle.

Some days ago a discussion took place in the public prints on the subject of mummies. In a discussion of the kind it could hardly be expected that the Egyptian brand would be overlooked, but if reference had been made to only the Egyptian article little would remain to be said, for Rameses II, as a mummy, has really received quite as much publicity as he deserves.

There is a mummy that can hold its own against all comers on exhibition in a very modest way in the church of St. James, Garlickhithe, or Garlickhy, or Garlickhythe, for the name is spelt in three ways. It was so named, according to an old chronicle: "Further of old time, on the River Thames, near to the church, garlick was usually sold." The thoroughfare that bounds the church building on the west is still known as Garlick Hill. Not long ago an old house that stood near the church was demolished. In digging a cellar for a modern structure on the old site several piles were found. These piles were of the peculiar greenish hue that wood which has been a long time in salt or brackish water always obtains. The ground in the vicinity of the church is of chalk formation.

So many parishioners were buried in the little church yard that it was decided, about forty years ago, to cover the diminutive cemetery with a heavy coating of concrete. Before this was done a large number of bodies were disturbed. Those engaged in the work were surprised to find that, while the coffins had been reduced almost to dust, the bodies inclosed in lead lining were in a state of almost perfect preservation.

With one exception the bodies were reinterred. The exception had suffered somewhat from exposure to the atmosphere and perhaps from careless handling, but it is today wonderfully well preserved. The identity of this English mummy could not be discovered, for the coffin in which it had been inclosed had crumbled away, and had not been furnished, apparently, with a plate. The coffin, it is supposed, had dried up the animal tissue by absorbing every particle of water, and thus prevented putrefaction.

At any rate, the mummy that can be seen at St. James (Garlickhithe) church shows no signs of decay today, though it has been out of the ground forty years, and had been in mayhap 150 years or more. Just within the entrance to the church, on the south or Thames street side, is a plain wooden case. It is about 6 feet in height, 2 feet in breadth and 18 inches in depth.

"You want to see the mummy, I suppose" said the sexton, Robert Sharp, when I presented myself at the church yesterday. Without more ado he opened the wooden case. Inside the wooden door was a glass front that now stood open.

Inside the glass, gazing pensively through eyeless sockets at a flagstone that was a little darker than its fellows, was the English mummy.

The skin would have been white but for a pale yellow tinge. The skin was everywhere smooth and intact. The nose was that of a young man who must have stood six feet in height and been of fine proportions. The shoulders were broad, the arms long and powerful looking. Every finger and toe was perfect. Both hands and feet must have been small. That the figure was that of a young man seems certain from its general appearance, but more particularly from the small size and excellently preserved condition of the teeth. There had been hair upon the head when the body was exhumed, but atmospheric influences had destroyed every vestige of it. Unless the visitor looks closely at the head an impression will be carried away that there is still hair upon it. This impression will be due to a network of cobweb which is yearly growing thicker. When the body was taken from the ground the teeth were perfectly white. They are gradually turning black.

"The glass front was put in the case," Sexton Sharp said, "to prevent visitors from jabbing the mummy with fingers, canes or umbrellas."

"Why did they jab the mummy?"

Sexton Sharp said he supposed "they wanted to hear his insides rattle." He then explained that while handling the mummy he and others had discovered that the intestines had become shriveled, and would make a noise like a kettle-drum when the mummy was shaken.

Not a great many people visit the church to see the mummy, the sexton said. For people who did not live in the city the church was in an out of the way place, he supposed. He had heard that the mummy was 200 years old, but could not certify to that of his personal knowledge, for he was only 48 years of age, and had "been around the church only about forty years." —London Herald.

ABOUT CLOTHES PINS.

Some Talk with a Dealer in These Adjuncts of a High Civilization.

"The longer you lif," as a philosophic German once remarked, "the more you findt, by chimineedy, oudt!" During a desultory walk about the city the other day the writer was more than ever struck with this triple shod truth.

For instance, there's the common, everyday clothes pin—the reliable old bisected clothes pin of our mothers, which no man has ever been able to improve on anymore than he has improved upon the wheelbarrow or the old fashioned wooden rolling pin. Who would imagine that there was anything about the clothes pin that was worth finding out? Nobody! But there is.

In his walk the writer was passing a little grocery, where a box of clothes pins was among the things displayed outside.

"How much for clothes pins today?" he asked of the grocer.

"Four cents," was the reply.

"Four cents apiece?"

"Apiece! Great Hickory! no. Four cents a dozen!"

"Ah-h-h! Are you a good judge of clothes pins?"

"Should say so! I've made more than a million of 'em!" replied the storekeeper.

"I've followed the clothes pin, sir, in all the processes of its evolution, from the growing tree to the polishing box. Say!" exclaimed the dealer, in a sudden burst of confidence and picking up a clothes pin, "To look at that pin you'd scarcely believe that the manufacturer could make and sell twelve of them for a cent, and have any profit of more than 50 per cent. on them at that; now, would you?"

"Not to look at it, I wouldn't."

"But he can do it, sir," exclaimed the grocer. "He can do it. He can whittle out clothes pins at the rate of eighty a minute. How? Easy enough, if he's got to do is to take his maple or birch log and go to work. So his big log is ten feet long and a foot through. He won't have to pay more than $2 for it. If he gets a lot more than that he don't know his business. That log will whittle up into 12,000 clothes pins as certain as the tree the log came from grew. It will take the man two hours and a half to chew that log up into clothes pins, which is at the rate of 4,800 an hour. But when they are all cut out they are worth $96.40 to the maker. He will work ten hours a day, if he is smart, and will get away with four of those logs. It's easy figuring to find out that he will then have on hand 48,000 clothes pins, worth $855.60 if they're worth a cent.

"The lumber for those pins has cost only $8, providing the man wasn't stuck in buying it. Now, if that was all the expense, a man with a clothes pin factory would be a blind eight better off than if he owned a coal mine. But those logs have to run the gauntlet of a good deal of machinery before they are full fledged clothes pins. A saw separates the log into lengths of sixteen inches; another one saws these blocks into boards three-quarter of an inch thick; a third saw reduces the boards to strips three-quarters of an inch square. These little strips are pasted to a big wheel, which hurries them to a gang of other saws, where they are chopped into clothes pin lengths quicker than a sausage machine can chop up a pound of beef.

"These lengths are carried by a swift moving belt to a machine that grabs them and sets them in a lathe. The lathe gives them their shape in the twinkling of an eyelid. Strange to the man, who feeds them to still another saw which moves backward and forward as if it were madder than a snake. This saw chews out the slot that the washerman is to shove down over the clothes on the line one of those days, and the clothes pin is ready, all but kiln drying and polishing. Kiln drying knocks the sap out of the wood, and the polishing is done by letting the clothes pins rub against themselves in a revolving cylinder.

"All these processes cost money, and when the manufacturer comes to put up his goods for sale he has to make his profit on the 48,000 pins, or a day's hard work, at a cent a piece, or about 48 cents a thousand, and, really, sir, I am compelled in these tight times to sell them for 4 cents a dozen, or $3.38 a thousand, which wouldn't be so bad if I sold a thousand every hour or so. But, with care, a thousand clothes pins will stay by me for a month or two, and I have even had them with me a whole year. Chinese cheap labor is pelting the life out of the clothes pin trade, for Ling Sing and Wun Lung don't use clothes pins in their laundries, and they're washing about all the clothes that are washed, it seems to me, nowadays. How many dozen shall I do you up, sir?"

"Half a dozen'll do," said the reporter, and the man looked disappointed as he counted them out.—New York Sun.

Convenience for House Hunters.

The house hunter must have observed that within a few years the real estate agents of the city have shown a tendency toward the adoption of trade marks or distinguishing emblems on their "for rent" signs. For a long time these placards were all of uniform design. One firm adopted the plan of covering a fair of the placard surface with red paint or ink. Such a placard could be readily identified a block distant. The idea caught on, and now there are stars, anchors, shields and cross bars, white letters on a black ground, clubs and disks in red, white and blue, crosses, diamonds, triangles—in fact every form of simple design and outline. Another reform that is much appreciated by house hunters has been introduced by enterprising agents, and that is to have at the office photographs of the exterior of the buildings for rent and a floor plan of the house, showing the location of the closets and stairways, the size of the rooms, etc. A lady can tell by a single glance at the plan whether the house will suit her or not, and it saves her the labor of running all over the city on an errand that is full of disappointment.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

The Bear Lake Bridge.

EDITOR JOURNAL.—At the coming annual township meeting in the several townships the people of Charlevoix county will be asked to vote on the question of raising $2,000 by tax for the purpose of constructing a bridge across Bear Lake. Every voter should ask himself the following questions:

1. What will be my share of the tax, and can I afford it?

2. Will it benefit the public enough to justify the outlay?

The assessed valuation of the county is about $2,500,000. To raise $2,000 would require a tax of .8 of a mill on a dollar. A person whose property is worth $500 would have forty cents to pay.

It would benefit the public by giving a more direct route between places on Pine Lake and Petoskey and vice versa. It would benefit the farmers in this part of the county by giving them the privilege of marketing their produce either at Petoskey or at places on Pine Lake.

We believe what will benefit any part of the county directly will benefit the whole indirectly. The people in this part of the county have helped to pay for public improvements in other parts of the county, and think that it is only just that the county should assume the expense of bridging Bear Lake.

The Village Election.

Two tickets were in the field Monday for village officers,—"Citizens" and "Peoples,"—both made up of democrats and republicans. The "ring" worked like beavers for the "People's" ticket, especially for Mason and Ackert, insisting that their "vindication" demanded it. Every influence necessary to get votes was used, and the party lash was cracked when other means failed. By such means the "ring" got there, and consider themselves "vindicated."

The ticket elected is as follows:

President—A. E. Mason.

Trustees—John Burns, Fred A. Smith, and J. M. Ackert.

Clerk—H. S. Hardin.

Treasurer—F. E. Wood.

Assessor—H. C. Cooper.

Street Commissioner—John Lamphear.

Constable—Jas. Martin.

Burns, Harsha, and Martin were on both tickets. F. A. Smith made a gallant fight for the Citizen's ticket, and saved himself by only two votes.

There is abundant opportunity for interesting comment on the election, but for satisfactory reason we will say nothing this week.

Historical Society.

The following is the program for the meeting of Friday evening: Violin solo, "Hudson Waltz," Mr. Mills, with Miss Cassie Allen as accompanist; select reading, humorous, Miss Josie Litzan; paper of the evening, "Growth of Religious Work" Rev. W. H. McCartney; violin solo, "Fifth Air" by Dancla, F. A. Cochran; select reading, "The Convict's Christmas Eve," Mrs. H. M. Enos; vocal duet, "Music and her sister Song," Miss Buttars and Mrs. F. J. Mesch. Next meeting to be held at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. C. Y. Cook. Paper, "Important Inventions," Miss May Brown.

FIRE!

Green Block Wrecked

A. T. Washburne & Co.'s Dry Goods Stock Seriously Damaged.

At 7 o'clock this morning fire was discovered near the furnace in the basement of the Green block. The basement and first floor were occupied by A. T. Washburne & Co., dry goods and carpets. The alarm was given and the fire department responded promptly, but a failure to get steam gave the fire a good start.

Willing hands soon removed the stock. Still no water. A rush was then made for the old hand engine and it was put to work lively to save the building, while engineers Vote, Ackert and Washburn struggled in vain to get steam on the Silsby. The boys on the brakes kept the fire within the walls and probably saved Brown's bank building. Finally Hiram Wood made some suggestions as to firing, and was asked to lend a hand, which he did, and soon had the Silsby at work.

The fire was soon under control, though it had by that time made great havoc with the south wall, and destroyed most of the roof.

Green's building was damaged upwards of $1,000; insured. A. T. Washburne estimates his damage and losses at least $5,000, and it may possibly be more than that.

Brown's bank building was damaged by water and the furniture by removal.

A. D. Cruickshank and R. W. Kane had their law offices in the bank building, but removed everything, and the loss was small.

E. H. Green's office was emptied of its contents, and slightly damaged by water.

The failure of the Silsby, in view of the recent controversy, was a most unfortunate occurrence for all concerned, and for a time there was considerable excitement, and prospects of bitter feeling between the partisans on each side. Charges of tampering with the engine, and of incompetency were made by hot-heads on either side.

In an effort to get at the truth, we interviewed Engineer Vote, after the fire was out and the excitement over. His opinion was that the fines had not been thoroughly cleaned as they ought to be for a considerable time; that they had been cleaned only with the steam hose, and not by taking off the top jacket as should have been done; and that the accumulation of crust prevented the fire from making steam. "In the future" says Mr. Vote "the Silsby will be thoroughly cleaned, and always ready."

Mr. Ackert was of the opinion that the fire in the engine did not get a sufficient start before the horses took the engine into the street; that the jolting scattered the fire along the street; that on arriving at the dock oil was used to start the fire again, which made the fines sticky and retained the soot from the coal smoke and of itself made a scale and clogged the flues. Mr. Ackert said there was nothing in the work of the engine to indicate tampering. He believed that the fines were thoroughly cleaned the last time the engine was out, though he admitted the top had not been taken off in probably a year.

Whatever the cause, or wherever the blame, it is a serious matter, and we hope the experience gained will prevent its recurrence.

A. T. Washburne & Co. secured temporary quarters in the old Stockman building.

Card of Thanks.

I hereby tender my most grateful thanks to the Charlevoix fire department for the very efficient manner in which they worked in extinguishing the fire in my store building, and thus saving my office and residence.

A Scrap of Paper Saves Her Life.

It was just an ordinary scrap of wrapping paper, but it saved her life. She was in the last stages of consumption, told by her physicians that she was incurable and could live only a short time; she weighed less than seventy pounds. On a piece of wrapping paper she read Dr. King's New discovery, and got a sample bottle; it helped her, she bought a large bottle, it helped her more, bought another, and grew better fast, continued its use and is now strong, healthy, rosy, plump, weighing ten pounds. For fuller particulars send stamp to W. H. Cole, druggist, Fort Smith. Trial bottles of this wonderful discovery free at F. A. Hines & Co's drug store.

STANLEY'S OWN BOOK.

Entitled "In Darkest Africa, and the Quest, Rescue, and Retreat of Emin, the Governor of Equatoria."

Mr. Stanley has so far advanced in his account of his adventures in achieving the rescue of Emin as to be able to announce the title of his book. All sensible persons will wait with patience for the publication of the authentic account, "In Darkest Africa, and the Quest, Rescue, and Retreat of Emin, the Governor of Equatoria," though there will be an abundance of Stanley literature turned out from the printing presses for the next few months. Probably the smooth tongued book agent will be able to convince some guileless persons that he is retailing "Stanley's Own" long before the only genuine narrative of the great traveler's heroism, privation and suffering is given to the world. Would-be purchasers should be on their guard.—New York Tribune. The book will be published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Bulls of a German Professor.

The prize medal for absent mindedness during lectures must be awarded to a German professor of astronomy, Amer, who recently died in Vienna. One of his pupils had a list of his remarkable sayings, among them the following: "Julius Cæsar, disguised as a slave, swam naked across the Tiber." "Alexander the Great was born in the absence of his parents." "The Swiss are a mountainous nation, but in Scotland the cr Zmoe does not begin till October." "Hops were invented in Asia Minor." "Dun arose a general war on page 94." "The third Tunic war would have been out much sooner had it commenced a little earlier." "Covered with countless wounds Cæsar fell dead near the statue of Pompey; with one hand he drew his togs over his face while with the other he rallied for help."

ALCHEMY.

A dull gray sky and a chilly air,
With never a glint of the golden sun,
The trees are tossing their branches bare,
All stripped of their leafage from last fair;
I am lonely; my heart is full of care,
And I wish that the day were done.

So cheer; no comfort, my grief to deaden
He did not come! and the day is leaden.
* * *
Was ever a cloud so soft a gray?
And keen and pure is the chilly air,
The delicate branches softly sway;
Rich red on the sky seems each twig and spray!
How swiftly the hours speed away
And my heart has never a care.

Ah, love is the wizard gray and sober,
He came! He came! And the day is golden!

CHECKMATE.

Old Mr. Archer was a devoted chess player and an expert, at that. He held chess to be the only game fit for a gentleman. There were few of his acquaintances who could cope with him, and but one of them who could match him fairly. That was James Bittles, his lawyer. It was a close contest between the two—first one ahead and then the other.

Bittles stood high at the bar, but he usually won and retained Archer's confidence by his ability as a chess player. He was barely 40, and Archer maintained that by the time he reached 60 he would surpass all those around.

Archer had a daughter—his only child. Her father had married late in life, and ten years after the birth of the girl her mother had died. Letty held a place in his heart next to chess itself. A bright, lively and pretty girl was Letty Archer, and she would be an heiress to something over a million. Her father feared she would become the prey of a fortune hunter, and endeavored to avert it by the provisions of his will. He neglected to execute his testament, however, until Letty was nearly twenty years old, and a spinster miss. It was none too soon, for the week after he died suddenly of an apoplectic fit.

When the will was opened it was found that Bittles was named sole executor and constituted guardian of Letty until she was 21, and trustee of all the estate, real and personal. The conditions of the trust were that, if Letty married with the consent of Bittles, the trustee was to turn over to her all the property on the day of the wedding, and so long as she remained unmarried after 21 to pay her the rents and the interest as they accrued; but if she married without his consent, she was to receive only five thousand a year, and the residue of the estate beyond that necessary to secure this payment was to be conveyed to a third party or held by Bittles. The property was described as:

"Catherine Sinclair, daughter of Gordon Sinclair, now or late of the city of Baltimore, and the state of Maryland, if she be still single; or, if she be married woman, then to the said Catherine Sinclair, by whatever name she may be now known, to her and her heirs forever."

A further provision was that in case the said Catherine Sinclair, by whatever name she might be known, was dead, and had left an heir or heirs, the property was to go to them, the reversal amount in the contingency mentioned was given, devised and bequeathed to him, the said Bittles, who Catherine Sinclair or her father was, Letty could not tell, nor could the lawyer, but it was agreed that it was an early flame of Archer's. Some thought that the possible legatee was mythical, and brought forward to scare Letty from making an imprudent match. But the power of Bittles in the matter was as absolute as pen and ink could make it.

Bittles proved himself to be a vigilant guardian and a careful trustee—guarding his ward against adventurers, and managing the estate with prudence and vigor. Everything went well until about two months after Archer's death. Then the current of affairs rippled a little. Letty and Bittles both fell in love—Letty with Carter Cooke, a young man who belonged to what, before the late war, was known as "one of the first families of Virginia," and Bittles, in spite of his forty-one years, with Letty, who did not know a man for him, looking upon the middle aged bachelor as a venerable person, and bestowing her heart upon his younger rival. Love is like the measles, and if we be attacked with it in middle age, the disorder assumes an aggravated form. Bittles had a very severe attack indeed.

Letty might well be excused for reciprocating the feelings of Carter Cooke. The young man was not only by blood, but by culture and associations, a gentleman, with no conceivable habits, and with polished manners. He had a well proportioned figure, as well as a pleasing face; and he did not even drink! In fact, so many of the tidewater Virginians do. He was well liked in New York, where he spent about half of the year, and though not by any means a fifth as rich as Letty would be, was possessed of a handsome competence. Bittles pronounced him to be a fortune hunter, and frowned upon his suit, but was careful not to interfere with the one he wished to make. Letty was not of age to resent the effect on the serious consequences of her guardian's disapproval, and, had she been, her cheerful temper would have led her to optimism. Then Carter Cooke was a skillful chess player, and Letty, who had been taught by her father, was about as expert as he, which strengthened the bond between them.

The cooing went on in spite of the frowns of Bittles, and the latter began to show the bitterness of defeat. This was seen when the young lover, with Letty's consent, made a formal proposal to the guardian for the hand of his ward.

"No, sir; decidedly, no!" replied Bittles. "I have nothing against you personally, Mr. Cooke. Your respectability is established; but I do not consider you, nor will any one else, a match for Miss Archer in fortune. I have examined the property your counsel had before me, and find you have barely four thousand a year. Make the property of my ward a year, twelve times that amount, most of it in real estate that is rising in value. I should be false to my duty if I approved of the match under such circumstances."

"Very good, sir," retorted Cooke. "For be it from me to say that I presented pretensions of your own prompt your refusal. I will admit that it is a mere sense of duty, if that admission pleases you. But I am authorized by Letty to say that when she arrives at the age of 21, should your consent to our marriage be refused, we will marry without it. That will be the next move on the board, Mr. Bittles."

"You are playing a costly game, sir."

"Not at all, sir. At all events, I shall call on the bishop to capture your queen," replied Cooke, good humoredly, and bowed himself out of the office with mock courtesy.

When Letty heard of this positive refusal, in spite of her avowed contempt for money, she was disposed to be downcast. But Carter whispered to her a secret, a proverbially dangerous thing to do to a woman, and Letty, after a look of astonishment, burst into a ripple of silvery laughter.

"Oh, you dear, delightful Carter!" she exclaimed. "Who would have thought it?"

And Letty renewed her laughter, for the secret seemed to her the exact comical thing in the world.

Bittles did not desire at all to exact the penalty; but he did very much desire to break the disagreeable connection. But how? Letty went into society under the chaperonage of Mrs. Burroughs, Bittles's own sister, a well to do widow, who was four years his senior, and liked the mild kind of dissipation which she enjoyed by virtue of her office. At all routs, kettledrums, parties and the operas, or wherever Letty went, Carter Cooke was sure to be, and Letty suffered him to assume the right of prospective ownership in a way that drove all other suitors from the field. Letty made no secret of her feelings, and wore her engagement ring openly. Mrs Burroughs, who liked Cooke, tacitly aided and abetted. It soon became known that Bittles frowned on Cooke, and there were curious to learn how the affair would end, as though, in such a case, with two willful young persons, it could end in any way but one. Bittles was daily informed of his ward's open courtship, and the lectures he bestowed on Letty in consequence only increased his wards disliko to himself, until it deepened to positive aversion.

Bittles trained to time and the chances. He did not believe that Letty, when the pinch came, would sacrifice so large a portion of her property for a mere girlish love, which might be destroyed at any time by a lover's quarrel; nor that Cooke, whom he had brought himself to believe had mercenary motives, would care to take her with so much less money. Nine thousand a year to one of Letty's expensive habits meant almost exclusive penurious poverty. He knew that Letty did not like living in the country, except in the time of flowers and sunshine, and then varied by Newport and Saratoga. Bittles waited, not without hope.

He had calculated on an ally in his sister, and, to insure her co-operation, told her of his hopes and fears. She laughed at him.

"James," she said, "this is the most absurd thing possible. She is about half your age. You have staid, old bachelor habits, and Letty, though she's a good girl, is fond of life, society and gaiety. She'd drive you mad in six months, and put you in the grave in less than a year. If you must make an exhibition of yourself matrimonially, choose some rich widow of 30 to 40, who would suit you better."

"Hang rich widows!"

"Quite polite and complimentary, considering that I am a widow with a comfortable income. You had better give it up. I have sounded Letty to the depths, and know that she loves young Cooke, and he is—having fortune—a capital mate for her. I would have preferred her to have made a richer match, but they will have enough between them."

"No, they it not; for I will never give my consent. I'll take her from you—lock her up, if need be."

"You are a lawyer, and know better, James. You may refuse your consent, though every one will penetrate your motives and laugh at you; but as to the locking up—they do such things in plays and novels, not in real life."

"She is under my control until she is 21."

"Oh, yes—doubtless; that is, nominally—for three months more. Then she'll marry in spite of you. If you strip her of all but five thousand a year, you'll incur general reproach and gain no satisfaction in the long run. The best you can do is to keep off the wedding for a short time. Give in. If you were ten years younger I might strain a point to help you—not as it is."

As the Irish peasant girls say, "she was as stiff as he was stout," and Bittles fell back on his move of the fortfature, for he knew thought would deter both parties for some time, and, in the meantime, who one could tell what a chance quarrel, a newer face or the whims of a woman might do.

Bittles had fate seemed to come to the assistance of the guardian lover. It seemed to come even in the shape of a new suitor, or something like it, and, to the delight of Bittles, it was also a Virginian—Maj. Rolling.

"Fire fight fire," thought Bittles.

Maj. Phil Rolling was considerably older than Carter Cooke, as he should have been, since he had fought in the second war, ridden with Jeb Stuart, and tasted the horrors of prison life at Elmira. Originally in comfortable circumstances, the war had stripped him of much, and reduced him to a plantation on tidewater, large but not profitable, and some houses at Richmond, whose rents formed his income. The major was of the old school, popular with the ladies, to whom he showed a respect almost reverential, and Jim Cooke came north for two or three months—his winter term, and his summering at the White Sulphur, combining his surplus means. He was very much attracted by Letty Archer, and she liked to chat with him and draw out his old fashioned courtesy. They moved in the same set and met frequently.

Carter Cooke was at this time called southward on business, and the major all I into his place in spite of his years and displayed an attentiveness that led people to suspect that he had pretensions. To the surprise of Mrs. Burroughs the grey one an almost confidential intimacy. Cooke seemed to have been forgotten in his absence, and Bittles chuckled. The gallant ex-officer showed himself to be under a spell, and expressed his admiration in the most positive terms.

"I assure you, my dear madam," said he to the widow, "that Miss Abchah is a young lady, that, besides her youth and beauty, has mo' of the cotely manuah of the fahst families of Virginiah than any gentlewoman except you'self, that I have had the good fawtune to meet yet in society."

Letty and the major got along famously and his adulation apparently quite supplied the absence of Cooke. This was supplemented by the attentions of her guardian, who became kind and bland again.

Letty's twenty-first birthday came around, and Mrs. Burroughs' stately mansion was thrown open in honor of the event. It was an informal reception, to last during the day. The major was specially invited; so was Carter Cooke, who had just returned from his place at Highover, where he had been superintending repairs and alterations in the old family mansion. Bittles was there, of course, gorgeously arrayed in honor of the occasion.

About noon Letty was missing, and the absence of the major was noted. Cooke had not yet come. Letty was not to be found in the house, but one of the servants had noticed that she and the major had gone out together, entered a coach in waiting on the corner, and been driven away. It was most extraordinary, and Bittles grew excited over the fact. The guests present heard it, and admitted that it was a singular thing at such a time. It was, probably, a girlish freak, to result in some surprise; and so it proved.

At 1 o'clock a number of coaches drew up before the door. From the foremost of these descended the major, who handed out Letty, who was followed by Cooke. From the other coaches there alighted a number of the ladies and gentlemen in this corty, to be assorted from his grain after harvesting.—Country Gentleman.

Musical Flames.

The well known experiment of making sounds by holding a tube over a jet of burning gas (usually hydrogen) is often omitted in chemistry classes because no suitable tubing is at hand. A fact not noted in any text book I have seen, and unknown to all teachers that I have consulted, has been brought to light in my classes, viz.: a bottle will serve in place of a tube. A "philosopher's candle" properly burning will yield a fine sound if capped by a wide mouthed bottle, as a gallon bottle or a large test tube. Of course, this is according to the principle of acoustics, but it seems strange that no text book gives it. I should like to know if this fact is known to any one.—W. T. Berry, Smith in Science.

DO NOT EAT TOO MUCH.

PROFESSOR ATWATER'S LECTURE ON A VERY PRACTICAL TOPIC.

The Relation of Food to Health—Ignorance of the Laws of Eating Claims Many Victims—Scientists are Now Giving Attention to the Subject.

The lecture was by Professor W. O. Atwater, on "Food and Health." It was under the auspices of the scientific societies of Washington and the Smithsonian institution. The principal point of the lecture was the adaptation of food to the demands of the body, and of the evils of overeating and insufficient nutrition.

The eating of bread and meat is a simple matter, but the way in which the different constituents of the food perform their offices in the maintenance of life are problems as profound as any with which physical science has to deal. The works of nature culminate in man. In his organism her operations are most complex and recondite. The laws which regulate our physical being are discovered, but slowly, and by the most ingenious and profound research. Those which govern the nutrition of our bodies have been shrouded in mystery, which only the investigation of later times has begun to unveil. But the crude theories of the past are being gradually replaced by the more certain knowledge of the present.

But this evil of overeating, be it great or small, is a modern one, confined to the classes to whom generous fortune, unchecked by reasonable restraint, allows it. There are comparatively few from dietary habits into which self indulgence has not tempted, but relentless nature has marked that she and the major had gone out together, entered a coach in waiting on the corner, and been driven away. It was most extraordinary, and Bittles grew excited over the fact. The guests present heard it, and admitted that it was a singular time at such a time. It was, probably, a girlish freak, to result in some surprise; and so it proved.

At 1 o'clock a number of coaches drew up before the door. From the foremost of these descended the major, who handed out Letty, who was followed by Cooke. From the other coaches there alighted a number of the ladies and gentlemen in this corty, to be assorted from his grain after harvesting.—Country Gentleman.

MOST DELIGHTFUL PLACE to live in summer, and a healthful climate in winter, with its usual unchangeable and invigorating, but not severe temperature.

FOR $300 a man can buy a nice hardwood tract, clear it up, and have a neat farm.

FOR $500 he can do still better. His logs and wood can be sold to the numerous lumbermen at fair prices, and he can live and clear his farm at the same time.

FOR $1,000 he can buy a small, partly-cleared farm.

$2,000 TO $10,000 will buy good farms in the various portions of the country.

CITIES AND VILLAGES have their graded schools, church and society privileges, and one seeking a healthful location, free from cyclones, epidemics, drought, and all annoying visitations, should come to Northern Michigan.

BUSINESS.—There are numerous openings for business men with either small or large capital.

RESORTING.—Northern Michigan is famed for its summer resorts, fine fishing, and picturesque scenery.

CROPS.—Crops of all kinds do well. Oats, wheat, corn, barley, rye. Finer spring wheat isn't grown anywhere in the world, than in northern Michigan.

MANUFACTURING. The chances for capital are endless. Furniture, wood pulp, wooden ware, chairs, and a thousand other industries, the numerous varieties of wood go into, afford the manufacturer a choice.

Spring weather.

Charles Hudkins took a business trip to Petoskey last week.

A load of our young people went to East Jordan to Saints' meeting last Friday evening.

Joseph Warden has gone to Sheboygan, Wis., for a few days visit.

Afton school has an old-fashioned spelling school on Thursday evening this week.

Later victims of the "grippe" are Ashland Bowen, Chauncie Hudkins, Blanch Kuhns and Myrtle Isaman.

Wm. Preble went to Central Lake last week to see his wife, also his son who recently arrived. He reports all doing well.

F. Gibbs Esq. of Sheboygan, Wis. Inspector of C. C. Company was a guest of J. R. Vance two days last week.

Adam Barkley of Banks was seen on our streets on Sunday last accompanied by one of our numerous schoolmarms.

Elder Gulick of East Jordan preached at Afton on Sunday afternoon, to a large audience. He was accompanied by his daughter.

Dan Hudkins and family are now domiciled with Supervisor Hudkins where they will remain until their house is built, which will be soon.

Mr. Boswell, photographer, of East Jordan "took" the teacher and pupils at Afton, also the saw-mill and crew, one day last week.

H. Bergman went to his home near Charlevoix and returned with Mrs. B. and the baby on Thursday last. They are now stopping with Mrs. Cooper for a few days.

Will Warden, of this place and Annie Nowland of Boyne Falls were recently united in marriage at Boyne City. Their many friends wish them long life and happiness.

Mrs. Adaline Warner of Warner township died at East Jordan, on Monday morning. She has been a sufferer from Brights disease and other complaints for several years. She is one of the pioneers of this country. She was about 48 years of age and leaves a husband and two children, Mrs. O. Ball and Erastus Warner, besides many friends to mourn her loss. MARCH 19.—Who ever saw a finer winter for business than we have had this winter?

Town meeting is soon here, and pathmasters are to be elected. There is no office in a town of more importance than pathmaster, if good roads are considered. Therefore I would advise all town-meetings to look well to the election of pathmasters.

I am delighted to see so many shingle bolts now moving toward the Charlevoix shingle mill. Archie Buttars seems to have his eyes on all the good shingle timber.

I see that Wm. Harris is appointed teacher at the oldfashioned district school at Charlevoix Friday night. I wonder if he has been examined and got his papers, showing him capable. He will find the scholars wear shorter hair than they did when he was a teacher.

Dr. N J Perry, formerly of Charlevoix, now at Pontiac, was married last week to a lady at Lapeer.

Four or five loads of Charlevoix young folks surprised Miss Carrie Hilton last Monday night. They brought a fiddler along and made him earn his money.

The Norwood school inspector visited the Norwood school on Tuesday, and reports it in a flourishing condition. Admis Cooper of Charlevoix is teacher and she gives satisfaction.

James Weaver and wife of Hayes visited O. D. Hilton and family last week.

There is a republican in one of the towns of this county who has offered to do the supervisor business one year for five dollars. Why not give it to him and let the poor take care of themselves.

NO FIRES THERE.

A People who Shiver for Six Months and Perspire During the Rest of the Year.

Fashion rules the world over. Every people has customs of its own, many of them strange enough to outsiders. Mr. Curtis, in his "Capitals of Spanish America," comments upon one of the curious notions prevalent in Santiago, a city which he describes as "by far the most modern and elegant fashionable resort in South America." Although the climate of Santiago is similar to that of Washington or St. Louis, the people have an idea that fires in their houses are unhealthful, and, except in dwellings built by English or American residents, there is nothing like a grate or stove to be found. Every one wears the warmest sort of underclothing and heavy wraps indoors and out. The people spend six months of the year in a perpetual shiver and the other six in a perpetual perspiration. It looks rather odd to see civilized people sitting in a parlor surrounded by every possible luxury, fire alone excepted, wrapped in furs and rugs, with blue noses and chattering teeth, when coal is cheap and the mountains are covered with timber; but nothing can convince a Chilkoot that artificial heat is healthful, and during the winter, which is the rainy season, he has not the wit to warm his chilled body.

It is odd, too, to see in the streets men wearing fur caps, and with their throats wrapped in heavy mufflers, while the women who walk beside them have nothing at all on their heads. During the morning, while on their way from mass, or while shopping, the women wear the mantas, as they do in Peru, but in the afternoon, on the promenade or when riding, they go bareheaded. The prevailing diseases are pneumonia and other throat and lung troubles, and during the winter the mortality from these causes is immense, but the Chilkoot persists in believing that artificial heat poisons the atmosphere, and when he visits the home of a foreigner, and finds a fire, he will ask that the door be left ajar so that he may be as chilly as usual. At fashionable gatherings, dinner parties and the like, women may be seen in full evening dress, with bare arms and shoulders, while the temperature of the room is between 40 and 50 degs. Fahrenheit.

PRENATAL PROTECTION.

SOME INTERESTING FACTS ABOUT THE TINNED PLATE SWINDLE.

Increased Duties Hovering in the Future. Threatened Industries Protected—Intended Blessings of Nature Twisted Curses They Become Curses.

Our high protectionist law makers have such maternal instincts that they not only furnish protection garments to infant industries which have recently seen the light of day, and to others which have grown old and hardened in their sins, but they even go further and provide a wardrobe for those not yet born.

A case in point is our unborn tinned plate industry.

Tinned plate consists of sheets of the very best grade of Bessemer and Siemens-Martin steel covered with a coating of tin. The use of this tinned plate in this country is enormous and rapidly increasing. According to the latest treasury reports, we brought in last year 742,135,000 pounds, bearing a value of $21,726,000. The duty is one cent a pound and amounted last year to $7,421,000, which is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of about 34 per cent.

Our supply of these plates comes from the world, some ninety-five in number, are located. The cost of the plates in Wales, coated with tin, polished, cut into the required sizes, packed in steel boxes to prevent rusting at sea, and delivered on board ship, is slightly less than three cents a pound. The cost in this country of American made steel sheets, not coated with tin, not cut into required sizes, not packed and delivered, is today four cents a pound or more. This we owe to one of our numerous highly protected trusts—an infant industry some forty years old.

The uses of the plate are many and various. There are milk pails and pans, dinner pails and pans for making bread, cakes and pies; there are colanders, graters, skimmers, strainers, tea kettles and coffee pots; there are boilers, wash basins and foot tubs; there are cans for packing vegetables, fruits, oysters, fish and cooked meats—all of these, and many more useful and necessary articles, all made of tin plate. It is thus of vital interest to some millions of men, women and children in this country that tin plate should be as cheap as possible. The canning industry of the United States has grown enormously in late years, and it only awaits cheap tin plate to develop into proportions never heard of before.

If we had cheaper tin plate we should hear less about fruits and vegetables glutting our markets every summer, and often being sold at prices ruinous to the grower. Not only would our surplus fruits and vegetables find a ready market at steadier prices, but the growth of these articles would be vastly enlarged, thousands of men, women and children would find more profitable employment as growers or as laborers in the fruit and canning factories, the consumption of these canned goods would be incalculably increased, and the whole public would be benefited in every way.

But what does congress say to all this? It says that the steel trust must have its pound of flesh, which, like Shylock, it exacts from the heart of the unprotected, miscared for consumer.

But what is the steel trust doing to merit such tender consideration for its every wish? What return is it making for the 45 to 58 per cent duties which congress levies on sheet steel to protect this thrifty infant? Like all other thrifty infants, the steel trust cries vigorously and incessantly for more. It has taken a great liking to its protection diet, and in obedience to its lusty cries congress will doubtless give it more. They already have the free block tin, which is used in coating sheet steel to produce tin plate.

But why should the trust undertake to manufacture the plate so long as it can exact from the consumer the present exorbitant profits? Our steel magnates do not need to exert their ingenuity to make a new article, from which it might not make as high a profit as it gets now. A steel trust is a "master," but it knows a good thing when it sees it.

And so we make no tin plate; but all the same the custom houses continue to collect the ad valorem duty of about 34 on every $100 worth brought in. The pies is that, though we have no infant industry of this kind, we do not know how soon one may be born, and we can take time by the forelock and be prepared for such accidents. As such a birth seems very imminent just now, owing to recent discoveries of tin mines within our borders, we must make all the better preparations for it. If 34 per cent. on tin plate, it is argued, did not hasten the birth while we had no tin mines, a larger duty will certainly do it, now that we have mines.

Hence it is now proposed to increase the duty on tin plate, which Mr. Mills, the wicked, unpatriotic Texan, proposed to put on the free list. The tin plate duty of the aforesaid senate bill of 1888 will apparently become the duty imposed by the forthcoming tariff bill. That would more than double the duty on the grade of tin plate which is most used with us.

Already protests are being heard from many parts of the country against this iniquitous piece of high protection folly. The Maine lobster canners, various dealers in New York, the oystermen and rocters of Baltimore and the western canners, in convention at Indianapolis, have expressed their opposition to the proposed increase. In Baltimore a sort of indignation meeting has been held, at which earnest words were spoken against the greed of the Pennsylvania capitalists in whose interests the increase is to be made. In that city vast quantities of tin plate are used for making cans for the oyster packers, and fruit canners of Maryland. There being 1,600 factories in and around Baltimore alone. At the meeting in question it was urged that if this increased duty should become a law all the smaller manufacturers of cans would be priced out, and the business would fall into the hands of large corporations, which would become masters of this field. With competition thus cut off, these canners would inevitably and willingly walk in the path which the tariff tinkerers have marked out for them and form a trust to "protect" themselves.

Valuable deposits of tin ore have been discovered in this country within a few years. Mines have been found in Virginia, in Texas and in the Black Hills of South Dakota. This last named has been gobbled up by a British syndicate for $5,500,000, and its first sale of tin was recently made in the Chicago market.

Plain, honest people are not able to see why our tin mines should prove a curse to us. They do not understand why tin should be made dearer to the millions of consumers precisely at the moment when we have discovered inexhaustible tin ore, with "veins measuring more than fifty feet in width," in our own soil.

The New York Press, which was founded to advocate the most orthodox stripe of high protection, confessed inadvertently a year ago that "tinned plate can be made in this country with natural gas cheaper than with coal as it is done in England."

Why, then, this more than doubled duty on tinned plate?

In the language of Hon. John A. Kasson with reference to a different duty "It is an attempt, against the interest of the consumer, to force the people of this country to pay more for what they need than the laws of Providence would otherwise require. * * * The title of this bill should be so changed as to read: 'A bill to prevent the diffused blessings of Divine Providence from being enjoyed by the people of the United States.'"

FOR CHEAPER FRUIT.

California's Demand for Prohibitory Duties—Protest in New York and Boston.

The Foreign Fruit Exchange of New York has memorialized the ways and means committee of congress in opposition to the increase of duties on raisins, prunes and oranges which has been asked for. The exchange asks that oranges, lemons, grapes, currants, dates, figs, prunes and plums be placed on the free list, and that the duty on raisins be reduced from two cents a pound to one cent. If this cannot be granted, then the exchange asks that substantial reductions be made.

The Boston exchange has indorsed the New York schedule. At the meeting of the Boston exchange importer opposed the removal of the duties on green fruits on the ground that if those duties were removed small importers with little or no capital would enter the business and would cause sharper competition and consequently diminished profits for those already in the business. From all which the consumer can see how the present tariff operates to keep the importing business in the hands of a small number of wealthy dealers, thus shutting off competition and keeping prices up.

There is so little reason at this time for increasing the duties on fruit that even the California Fruit Grower, the organ of the fruit growing interests of the Pacific slope, has entered its protest against the increase. It justly calls attention to the fact that only two states in the Union are interested in having the duties put up; and it warns the California grower that there is danger in his demand, by reason of the opposition which will be aroused in the east.

Nevertheless the California Fruit union has a memorial before the McKinley committee asking that the present duty of one cent a pound on prunes be increased to three cents. When it is considered that California prunes are of such excellent quality that they have created a high price market for them even among the richer classes, and when it is further considered that the bulk of the foreign prunes consumed by us is a low grade Turkish article, bought by the less wealthy classes, how absurd does this demand of the Californians become.

During the past three or four months California prunes have been selling at and in large quantities in New York at from 7.50 to 7.50 cents per pound, the consumer taking them in preference to French prunes costing one cent less. The Turkish prunes, used by plain, unpretentious people, are sold at from 3.50 to 3.75 cents a pound, including the one cent duty. The bulk of these foreign prunes is sold east of Chicago, and as the duty on them is already equal to the freight charges from California, it would seem that the handful of growers in that state might at least be content to have things as they are. We imported only 43,000,000 pounds of prunes and plums last year, against 74,000,000 in 1888. Is this the time to ask for a prohibitory duty? The consumers of foreign prunes paid in duties last year $437,000; are they willing now to pay $1,500,000, or else go without their prunes?

A ten pot window glass factory is being built at Alexandria, Ind. Our glass industry is in an unusually prosperous condition, but all the same the old cry for higher protection has been made in Washington, and the same pitiful tale is told that the pauper made glass of Belgium is invading our markets more than ever. The number of our pots for making window glass, however, has more than doubled in ten years. Those who want to see glass factories ought not to throw stones at Belgium.

Mr. A. B. Farquhar, president of the Pennsylvania Agricultural works, at York, Pa., says the tariff is of no benefit to his industry. He sells many articles of farm machinery abroad, in competition with the whole world, in spite of the duties on the raw material. He says that the only purpose the tariff serves in his industry is to make American farmers pay higher prices for their farm machinery and implements.

A suit against the Pittsburg Glass company, engaged in the manufacture of window glass, has brought to light the fact that the concern paid 35 per cent. dividends last year. With even a plum of that kind in its pocket the glass industry has not yet dropped its cry for more.

R. Connable & Sons, are fishing the steam tugs Parmalee and Leo from St. Joseph, and putting fresh fish into the Chicago market. Arthur has hold of the Chicago, and Ralph, Jr. of the St. Joe end of the line, The tugs will move north as soon as the ice moves out of the bay. —Petoskey Record.

Capt. Guard is preparing to repaint and fit out the steamer Joseph Gordon in better shape than ever for the season's work. He announces his intention of running on the East Jordan route, but will start from Charlevoix morning and afternoon, instead of East Jordan as heretofore, and will make a round trip a day. Capt. Guard is an accomodating, pleasant gentleman to do business with, and should receive a full measure of business. His boats are healthy is here and he spends his money with us, and certainly deserves the support of Charlevoix on the route he has selected. He finds no fault with his past business but thinks it will be much more pleasant to live at home.

Historical Society.

There was but a small attendance at the meeting last Friday evening. The program was short but interesting, as follows: Paper, "Important Inventions," Miss May Brown; vocal solo, Miss Edith Mason; select reading, C. J. Strang; violin and banjo duet, F. A. Cochran and Philo Brown; select reading, Miss Lina Waldron; violin solo, F. A. Cochran. The next meeting will be held on March 28th, place to be announced next week.

Six Knights will be Interested.

The Detroit Commercial, E. T. will erect the Casino Tabernacle booth as the Detroit April flower show, and they promise a unique and imposing structure. It will represent a fortress on the island of Malta, and, like those fortifications for 800 years, will bear the colors of the Knights Templar. A beautiful fountain the centrepiece, in ancient chain mail armor, will be constantly on guard to protect the garrison of the "helpless maidens," who will wear the Commandery colors of black and white.

THE FARMERS, TOO.

A Prohibitory Tariff for the Hop Growers. Our Large Importations.

It is not to be wondered at that at time when the tariff mania is attacking so many people of all conditions and occupations some of the farmers have caught the infection, too. The farmers, as is well known, have almost no "protection," and all the other protected classes prey upon the farmers as upon no other portion of our population. The farmers are so numerous and are so scattered over the land, have so little organization and so little means for getting their case heard by those in authority, that they get fleeced right and left, and are then told that it is all for their own good.

It is almost natural, therefore, that a limited number of farmers, pursuing a special form of industry like hop growing, should take advantage of their position to join in the universal clamor for high and higher "protection."

The hop growers of New York have petitioned congress to raise the duty on hops to 35 cents a pound. The duty now levied is 8 cents a pound, and this is equal, at present prices, to 40 per cent. ad valorem. The duty asked for would equal 135 per cent. ad valorem. Mr. De Lano has accordingly introduced a bill to make the duty 35 cents a pound, equal to 100 per cent. ad valorem.

The hop merchants of New York city have presented a counter petition, in which they make out a strong case against the claims of the growers. According to the treasury reports we imported last year 5,584,000 pounds of hops, and we exported 10,626,000 pounds. As we are able to sell abroad twice as much hops as we buy, it is somewhat curious to see the reason for any tariff.

The growers state that the hop industry is in a deplorable condition; their prices are lower than formerly; therefore congress must come to their relief. But the prices of wheat and corn are also much lower than formerly, and no amount of pretended protection can benefit the growers of these grains. Their surplus product, which is simply enormous, goes to foreign markets, and prices are regulated there by conditions beyond the reach of the strong arm of congress. The same is true of hops; one-fourth of our total product is sent abroad and receives the price prevailing in non-American markets.

Our growers will doubtless get their prohibitory duty through congress. But they should remember that it is a matter of much graver importance to them to have a market abroad for ten million pounds of American hops than to exclude from the American markets five and one-half million pounds of the foreign article. Retaliation abroad may result; for there have already been expressions of dissatisfaction among growers in foreign countries that American hops were imported in bond, to avoid the tariff. If there should be retaliation, the American grower may know who will be hurt most.

But is it not a consolation to the American grower should ask a prohibitory duty against the very foreigner whose markets he successfully invaded?

Another Trust in Prospect.

It is reported by The New York Commercial Bulletin that the manufacturers of Brussels carpets are in a bad way, prices being very low and competition very severe, and that a combination scheme is on foot.

This will be another one of the numerous cases in which the intrenched behind the tariff bulwark. Carpets of the kind named are now very cheap, and yet a half their cost is abroad.

Here, then, is a case where "protection has done its work"—its first work. Sharp competition has been developed and wealthy prices have gone down. Hence protection must now do its second work—it must give birth to a trust for the purpose of putting up prices to protect the other form. The president of the sugar trust remarked recently that the great trust over which he presides was simply endeavoring to do for itself what congress had failed to do for it; to do for other words, to protect an industry by keeping prices up, and thus making goods dearer to the consumer.

But the protection of the carpet makers has had another effect. The high price of the wool they need has fostered the use of shoddy to an extent never before seen. The common course wool used in carpet making pays a duty of two and one-half cents a pound, thus adding about 25 per cent. to its cost. The senate bill of the last congress proposed to reduce the duty to four cents a pound, or about 40 per cent. ad valorem. The present demands of the wool growers seem likely to result in an increase equally great, and perhaps greater, in the duty proposed by the house bill of Mr. McKinley's committee.

Will there be any there Republicans in congress who have said that those industries which form themselves into trusts should have the tariff prop knocked from under them?

Let them speak out now.

England's Boom.

England is one of the countries which are spoken of by high tariff delegations before congressional committees as "the world's great market for the nations of the earth."

But the commerce of England for the month of January reached a point never before attained by her, and was, consequently, greater than the commerce of any other nation at any time in the world's history.

The manufacturing industry of England is just now on such a boom that the factories cannot be actually scanned. The labor unions are not able to meet the demand for skilled laborers, and overtime is general in most of the larger establishments. The present year promises to be the most prosperous that England has ever had.

Will the protectionists then drop England from their familiar old "pauper labor" argument? Or will they change their tune and demand all the higher protection because the British laborer has full work and higher wages?

Why Some Cheap Books Do Not Sell.

"Since I have been in business I have learned a great deal about the public taste in reading matter," said a prominent newsdealer, "and if the publishing houses would follow the hints we could give there would be fewer unsuccessful books put upon the market.

"The paper covered novel has been very successful for some years, and now there isn't a publisher in the country who doesn't issue a 'series.' Inasmuch as several of these books are published every day, of course very few attain a sale of any consequence. In most cases this is the fault of the book, but I could cite instances where the failure was due to cupidity or lack of foresight on the part of the publisher.

"These novels sell for twenty-five or fifty cents, according to the length. There is no intermediate price. Some publishers, taking advantage of this, have padded a twenty five cent novel and charged fifty cents for it. This padding is all done in the printing. Extra heavy paper is used and the type is set in narrow columns. The book seems to contain a good deal, but the purchaser soon sees that he has been humbugged, and afterwards always examines more than the cover of the novel he buys. The wide margin, so dear to the heart of the book lover, is frowned upon by the novel reader. Often when he opens such a book in a hurry the wide margin gives him the impression that it is 'poetry,' and he drops it in a hurry. Nothing could exceed in intensity the novel reader's dislike to 'poetry.'"—New York Evening Sun.

A Human Stone Eater.

At Avignon, France, in 1760, a human stone eater was on exhibition for some time. He was not a "freak" or "fakir," but a real wild manticator of stones, found on an island between Iceland and the Swedish coast. He not only swallowed flints an inch or more in length, but reduced marbles, small pebbles and other rocks to a powder with his powerful teeth. Royal society physicians examined him and found his gullet very large and his saliva strong and corrosive. He would eat raw flesh with the stones, but could not be prevailed upon to swallow bread or other victuals. He would drink water, but much preferred brandy, and while under the influence of the liquor required twice his usual amount of stony food. When not eating or sleeping he smoked continually, sitting with one leg over the other, giving no heed to those passing around him. The flints he swallowed were, when voided, corroded and much diminished in weight, the rest of the excrement resembling pure mortar. He never learned to pronounce but a few words and soon died.—St. Louis Republic.

"For Rent."

Says a La Salle street agent: "I am going to make a suggestion which I think renters will appreciate. I am going to have all the houses and flats for which I am agent photographed. These photographs will be in my office. They will give the applicant some sort of an idea of the premises before he goes to make an investigation. Wherever I have a house or flat for rent I will arrange to have the key to the premises convenient and will pay the man who keeps the key a percentage of the first month's rent to answer all questions regarding the premises. A man who rents a house to live in has some rights. The man who is about at hand when the unaccommodating landlord who cares for nothing but his rental will have to adopt some other business. The old fashioned house and flat must give way pretty soon. There is no room left in the way of modern improvements for the old style house."—Chicago Tribune.

Greeley as a Farmer.

When Horace Greeley lived at Chappaqua he wrote his celebrated book on farming, and insisted that his friend Jones should purchase a farm adjacent to his own. When he had ceased picturing the delights and advantages of such a residence, Mr. Jones asked him what he had raised that year.

"Well," said Mr. Greeley, "I had a good crop of hay."

"That is encouraging," said Mr. Jones. "I suppose you realized a profit from it."

"Not a great profit," was the answer. "You see I had the hay cured and put it into the barn all right before the rain came, but that did not save it."

"How was that?"

"There wasn't any roof on the barn!"—Harper's Weekly.

The Use of Arsenic.

A woman of ordinary intelligence ought to know without being told that arsenical toilet preparations are dangerous to the health, and yet not a week passes that I am not in receipt of letters, most of them showing thought and ability, asking me to recommend some cosmetic for the elimination of pimples, or requesting to be told if arsenic is as safe for an internal medicine as it is for a complexion wash. These correspondents know that arsenic is a deadly poison, and yet they talk about its use as if it were the simplest and safest drug in the world. Arsenical doses will put an end to pimples, and, what is more, an end to the life of the person using them.—Eleanor Kirk in Atlanta Constitution.

A Magnificent Water Plant.

The leaves of the Victoria regina attain a diameter of six feet. They are circular, with a raised rim like the rim of a shallow pin pan. The largest flowers are twelve inches across. They are white, with a yellow center, and exhale a wonderful perfume. The stems and leaves stretch out twenty feet from the plant. A board has been placed on one of the floating leaves, and a child 8 years of age has been stationed upon the board.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Current Comment.

The Evening Sun is a new democratic daily in Detroit. Only 25 cents a month by mail.

Poor Mr. Harrison, he is indeed to be pitied when even Jay Hubbell can come to Washington and abuse him through the medium of a newspaper interview.

Petoskey has voted $8,000 bonds to build a high school building in place of the one recently burned. This, with the funds on hand, will build the finest building exclusively for high school purposes in northern Michigan.

If the Patrons of Industry stick to their text and never buy except for cash, it will save them an immense sum and lower prices, because now the merchant makes the good customer pay a percentage to cover loss on the bad ones.—Record.

The Bauerle wooden ware works at Petoskey were burned last Friday morning; loss $100,000, insured $60,000. About 100 men are thrown out of work. Mr. Standish of Pittsburg, principal owner of the factory, announces his intention of rebuilding at once, larger and better than before.

Ex-Speaker Carlisle's statement showing that the appropriations contemplated by the republican majority would leater no deficiency in the treasury has caused Mr. Cannon, chairman of the house appropriation committee to make a statement which he calls an answer to Mr. Carlisle. Mr. Cannon's estimate leaves out a number of appropriations that the republicans generally have pledged their party to make. Time will tell which statement is correct. For the sake of the country Mr. Carlisle would not object to having Mr. Cannon prove to be right.

In 1884 Hon. Frank H. Hurd made an eloquent speech in the house of representatives at Washington on the question of a reciprocity treaty by which the markets of other nations should be thown open to the products of this country. In the course of his remarks he said:

"I say to the farmer of America that the prospects for him are by no means encouraging. With elevators, granaries, and warehouses all filled to overflowing; with the vast fields of the great west greening to the coming harvest; with crops unexcelled in India, and almost ready for market, I predict that before many years the price of wheat will be so low that it will not pay the cost of production, and that corn raised on the western prairies will be burned for fuel. When the time arrives, the farmers will be beggars in the midst of their own plenty and in want by the side of their own golden gathered sheaves. There is absolutely no relief for the American farmer without reducing the tariff. Talk about the home market which American manufacturers make for him. Already the demand for agricultural products are diminishing; it is not in their power to control that the famers of this country can produce."

DREAMING AND HOPE.

The rosy wings of fancy
Are folded now in rest,
And hope has hushed her dreaming
To sleep within my breast.

And cold and drapl reason
Has whispered unto me—
If hope and fancy vanish
What life would sarely be.

If dreams be dead, no matter,
If hope should linger still,
Sweet peace will fan her pinions
And soften ev'ry ill.

But if the hope should perish,
And sky from life away,
A cloudy day the life, then,
With more and eve of gray

With no bright sun at noontime
To pierce the heavy pall,
To brighten with its glowing
The shadows over all.

And life would be unbolted,
A living hut to be!
Existence in all phases
A mere necessity.

Then wake, my sleeping fancy,
And hope awake to smile,
And slumber not forever,
But soothe my life awhile.

Then wake, plume your pinions,
To soar the rosy sea,
Fly forth, O blessed hoping,
And bring my joys to me.

THE FREED PRISONER.

"I consider it the only hope for him, judge," said the doctor.

"It will establish a bad precedent. The prisoners will think all they have to do is to get sick so as to get free," said the judge, firmly.

"It is but a question of time, at a very short time, too, before a greater judge even than you will give him his discharge, and not only him, but a good many others besides," said the doctor, much provoked.

"Eh, is that so?" said the judge, ignoring sarcasm, "is there really so much sickness in the jail?"

"A good deal, and chiefly confined to the United States prisoners. Spotted fever rages with fatal effect among them."

"That is strange. How do you account for it? Is illicit distilling an unhealthy occupation?"

"When it reaches its natural result of landing the operator into jail, there to sicken, it may be called decidedly unhealthy. But, jesting aside, these mountain fellows suffer more than the other prisoners for the reason that they have always lived a free life in the open air; therefore the close confinement of the jail proves very irksome and they sicken under it. This spotted fever is, I think, the result of lack of proper circulation of the blood. It is a sort of epidemic among the mountaineers. Some of them have died of it and others are very low, and they will die too, if they stay in that jail. The thought of going home is all that will save them now—Jack Bigby, especially; release is the only cure for him."

"He has no one to thank but himself," said the judge. "Why did he meddle with illicit distilling?"

"I grant all you say; but death is a severe sentence for a few gallons of mountain dew," said the doctor.

"True," said the judge after a pause, "I will suspend sentence in his case, and let him go home. Here is his release, or said he, as he filled out a blank; "take it to him—a new sort of physic, truly! But tell him he won't get off so easy the next time he meddles with the revenue."

"Or has a," said the doctor as he took the paper. "I will be many a day, if ever, before he will feel like playing with edged tools. Judge, this is the first time I ever envied your high position—when I see the mercy you can show."

"Is the sun a-shinin' outside, Pap?"

"Yes."

The sick man lay on his bank in his cell; his fever scorched tongue was stiff and blackened so that he could scarcely speak. It was difficult to recognize in the wan shadow lying there the stalwart mountaineer of a few months ago. His blue eyes were sunk deep in his head; his matted hair and beard were bleached from a sunburnt yellow to a sickly straw color, and over the hollow caverns of his cheeks the white skin, blanched by fever dank, was tightly drawn. On its blackened surface the red patches of the spotted fever showed with startling vividness.

Could this be Jack Bigby, the man who could outshoot, outride, outjump and outdance any of his comrades?

Old Bigby, otherwise Pap, as he sat by the bedside of his sick son, felt dazed and stunned by the change. He had only arrived that morning, and, in the few hours that had passed, failed yet to realize it. Could that be Jack? He was changed in his ways as well as in his looks. How strange he talked!

"Set whar I kain see ye, Pap," he said, when his father had arrived. "The sight of ye is good for sore eyes."

And, as he said it, all at once the father had looked at his child and felt like crying; he didn't know why. But he hadn't done it.

"Hit war powerful cur'ous. Jes' ter think o' Jack a-sayin' sech a thing! Reckon ye' ready fuck yer wanter be thar an' look at his ole pap!"

Mr. Bigby, it is true, was not a very beauteous object, nor one on which most people would crave to feast their eyes. He looked as if the summer sun had shone upon him very hot and the winter rain had beat upon him very hard. He could, in fact, be called weather beaten. His long, iron gray hair and beard were snarling quietly under the strange gale of his son. Mingled with his emotion was a feeling of wonder and horror at his changed appearance.

"His hands," thought the father, "air like chicken claws!" Could that pale, shadowy thing be Jack's muscular fist?

"Is the sun shinin' outside, pap?" asked Jack, for his father's presence had brightened up his cell.

"Yes," said the old man, "hit's a-shinin' right smart, but hit's so dim in hyar, ye kaint see hit."

"Hit air dim in hyar allus," said the prisoner, "tell fer a leetle taste o' sunshine, 'pears like I'd perish."

"You'll get better now," said the father, taking the invalid's thin hand in his brown, horny one, and awkwardly stroking it. "Why, ye' hand," said he by way of a joke, "is so thin an' white hit looks ceasmuse' like a streak o' light."

"I low I looks like a afternoon shadder, anyhow," said the invalid, feebly. "I kaint hold out much longer."

"Yer mouth's dry, honey," said the anxious father, unconsciously going back to his childhood's way of speaking to him. "Hyar, let pap gin ye a leetle sup o' water ter wet it."

But the prisoner closed his eyes and slightly shook his head.

"Jest a drap," coaxed the father; "jes the matter o' a drap, Jackie, honey."

"Not thet thar water," said the prisoner rousing up. "That thar prison water makes me heave. Oh, for a drink outer the spring at home! seems like I could drink hit dry."

Old Bigby felt frightened; he was no part of a nurse, and the changed appearance of his son still shocked him.

"Hit looks like good water," said he, "hit does. Try a sup."

But the sick man refused, and his father welcomed the entrance of the jailer.

"Here, Jack," said that official, "my wife's sent you some soup; try and take it."

But the invalid still refused. "I kaint eat hit," he said.

"What do you crave?" asked the jailer.

"Sunshine an' fresh a'r," cried the prisoner, rousing up. "If I could only git out whar the sun'd shine on me, an' the mountain a'r would blow on me, an' whar I could see the peak o' old Baldface, a-scrollin' up thetn pap's house, seems like I could git up an' run a mile."

"Cos should ha' thought of all o' that afore you went to monkeying with the revenue," said the jailer.

"I never thought ez how I'd be cotched," said the prisoner, sullenly.

"But hit does seem hard," said old Bigby, apologetically, "fer a man ter suffer so much—ceasmuse' pay with his life fer makin' a few gallons o' wild cat liquer likes that."

"The government don't want it," said the jailer, undertaking to explain the revenue system, "but it don't want you to have it, neither."

"Well, now, thet does look cur'ous," said old Bigby. "What kain hit matter ter the gov'ment fer what," he continued, as the jailer was unable to answer that question, "ez what's a man to do, ef he kain't git a drap of corn when he kaint git hit to market? We uns live on the side of ole Baldface, an ter haul our crops ter market costs purty nigh ez much ez the crop is worth. An this year, ye'll ter one accident an another, the crap piddled out o' the small een o' the barn. Hit didn't pay ter haul thet leetle bit ter market! Hit cost more ter git there they'd pay for hit. En we uns war hard up, we had sary sugar nor coffee—jes bread an a little late o' meat; an Jack he worries. I hain't a-yawse ter send hit, I hain't; I'll jes haul the corn over ter Stillinger's still en turn hit inter hug juice. Hit'll fetch nuff ter buy sugar an' coffee."

"So he hauled hit over ther ter the still, every bit of our crap we had a-store, an the stillers stilled hit on shares. The whole thing fell like playing with edged tools. Judge, this is the first time I ever envied your high position—when I see the mercy you can show."

"Is the sun a-shinin' outside, Pap?"

HE MADE ANOTHER RICH.

SEARCHING THE ROOM WHILE THE DOCTORS DISAGREED.

How a Wide Awake Merchant Decided a Knotty Medical Dispute and Made His Friend's Fortune—City Tricks That Were Useless in a Small Town.

"I have made one fortune in my time," said an old merchant the other day, "and—

"Spent it," broke in the writer.

"Didn't have that pleasure."

"Lost it?"

"No, sir; the fortune I made was that of another man."

"How was that?" asked the writer.

"After I left college," replied the first speaker, "I knocked about the country, here and there, for a few years, before I settled down in this city. In the course of my wanderings I met an old school friend who had gone to a medical college, and was then just starting to build up a practice in a small country town. When I ran across him he was in a dreadful fit of the blues, and I said to him, after his first greetings had been exchanged: 'Why, old man, you're not like your former self at all. What's the matter?' A trembling lung enough to have killed anybody yet, have you?'

"'No, my lung is all right,' he answered, 'not that. But, I have a patient in my care who is very seriously ill, and I don't know what to do.'

"'Is it almost certain death to venture,' asked the doctor. "'Wait till you get a little better.'

"'If I must die, immie die at home,' cried Jack. "'Pears like I could die easier that.'

Seeing that he was determined to go, the doctor ceased to urge him. "Have you the means to take him home?" I asked the father, who had arisen and seated himself on the side of the bunk.

"'Well, yes,' said the old man, 'I save my critter afore leavin' home ter git the money for come hyar on.'

"'If you sold your horse, how are you going to make your crop?' asked the friendly jailer.

"'Well,' said Mr. Bigby, unhaunted by the dismal prospect ahead, 'I thought as how I'd sell my cow an' calf, arter Jack is well nuff to do 'thaut the milk, an buy a steer. Only lemme git him back ter his ma in the mountains an we'll scratch long somehow.'

The sun shone bright and warm; the air was sweet and balmy; spring was coming fast, and April seemed to have hastened along the road to meet March and strewed a few of her days in his calendar. The sun beamed into the cell where Jack Bigby lay on two seats, apparently half asleep. For the first half of the journey the excitement, the change, the thought of home, had kept him up.

"The sun—the a'r," he cried, deliriously, "this's powerful good, pap!"

"Hit's mighty purty," said the old man, sympathetically.

But now, his little strength exhausted, Jack lay in a state of collapse that the father mistook for sleep, with the sun shining full into his face, though he did not seem to know it.

"Wake up, Jackie," said old Bigby, cheerfully. "We air over Canton now, an gwine in among the mountains. Look at 'em."

The sick man roused up, and with his father's assistance raised himself so as to look out of the window. As far as the eye could reach range after range of mountains met the view rising one above the other. The invalid gazed upon them as if he could never get his fill and drank in the mountain air as if it was an elixir.

"Thar, thar, Jackie," said his father; "I'm afeard you'll cotch cold."

"The sight er them is good for sore eyes," said the released prisoner. And language could go no farther in his case.

Old Bigby laughed. "What'll ye say when ye see Baldface, an then thar big pine that's growed on the tip top er hit war we use ter go a coon hunting?"

"If ever I gets able ter climb up thar, I'll never wanter come down again," said Jack.

Again his father laughed. "Is thet thar ole pine all ye're hankerin' arter, honey?" he asked.

"Is course I wanter see ma and the gals," said the sick man. "When I see ma agin I'—his voice failed him and he broke down.

"Thar, thar," said the old man hastily, "don't bother 'bout ma an the gals—not leas' when they'll hev' er slout on go roun' when they see ye. Lie down an git rest now."

He laid his son back on the seat, and Jack wearily closed his eyes and seemed to sleep. Absorbed with his unaccustomed surroundings old Bigby did not notice his heavy breathing, which was not stertorous, but quick and shallow. At last, glancing out the window, familiar objects came in view.

"Jackie," said the old man, "Jackie, wake up, honey. Thar's old Baldface. Look up. Es thar's yan pap."

The sick man unclosed his eyes, but they wore a strange look. "I see no pine," he said feebly.

Old Bigby grew frightened. He passed his arms around his son and lifted him by main force; terror gave him strength. "Look, look," he cried anxiously.

But his sons head fell back against his shoulder, the cool mountain breeze played with his hair, the sunshine beamed on his face, but the dying mountaineer saw nothing. In vain his glazing eyes turned toward the distant mountains.

"I kaint see hit," said he feebly. "I'm going fas'. Bury me on top er ole Baldface, pap, yander pine—thar I'll sleep free forever."

His struggling breath ceased. No more his darkening eyes could see the sun for which he so craved. The judge's suspended sentence now availed him naught. Summoned before a greater judge, the moonshiner was free.—Paul Grant in Atlanta Constitution.

She Was Not Over Pretty.

Giles—What did your friend mean when she said she was used to admiration? Surely she can't be a sideslyly.

Jennie—No, indeed. She meant that she rides in the elevated so much.—Epoch.

MOST DELIGHTFUL PLACE to live in summer, and a healthful climate in winter, with its usual unchangeable and invigorating, but not severe temperature.

FOR $500 he can do still better. His logs and wood can be sold to the numerous lumbermen at fair prices, and he can live and clear his farm at the same time.

FOR $1,000 he can buy a small, partly-cleared farm.

$2,000 TO $10,000 will buy good farms in the various portions of the County.

CITIES AND VILLAGES have their graded schools, church and society privileges, and one seeking a healthful home, free from blizzards, epidemics, drought, and all annoying visitations should come to Northern Michigan.

BUSINESS.—There are numerous openings for business men with either small or large capital.

RESORTING.—Northern Michigan is famed for its summer resorts, fine fishing, and picturesque scenery.

CROPS.—Crops of all kinds do well. Oats, wheat, corn, barley, rye. Finer spring wheat isn't grown anywhere in the world, than in northern Michigan.

MANUFACTURING.—The chances for capital are endless. Furniture, wood pulp, wooden ware, chairs, and every thing else in the manufacturer's line.

TAKE A RECEIPT.

Whenever a payment is made on subscription in wood or produce, we want every person so paying to call at the office and get a receipt for the same, so that proper credit may be given on the books. Sometimes this is done, mistakes and misunderstandings are absent sure to follow. Please remember it.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

With this issue I close my relations with the JOURNAL as proprietor and publisher. The printing material and subscription list have been sold to Mr. Chas. S. Hampton, of Petoskey, who will take possession on April 1st. All advertising accounts will be settled by me to that date. All subscriptions paid in advance will be furnished by him, and all subscriptions in arrears must be paid to him.

Mr. Hampton is too well known to the readers of the JOURNAL to need an introduction from me. He will make a newspaper worthy the best support of the people of this county, and in turn I hope the democrats of the county will give him the support which he will deserve.

The seven years I have lived and labored in Charlevoix have been in many respects pleasant and profitable years; and wherever my future duties shall call me I shall have gratifying recollections of friends and fellow workers here.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

[THE JOURNAL wants correspondents in all the surrounding towns in which it is not represented. Give us all the news in a brief and concise manner as possible. Correspondence should be mailed so as to reach us no later than Wednesday evening. Two very desirable features in correspondence are regularity and punctuality.]

Eveline.

MARCH 25—Mrs. Joe Tuttle is convalescent.

Joe Tuttle is able to be out again, but cannot speak aloud yet.

Burley Fletcher, an old resident of this place, but now of Traverse City, visited friends here recently.

It is reported that Miss Hattie Hayden, of Saginaw, has been engaged to teach the school in district No. 6, known as the Beers district.

Peter Tuttle has moved from E. G. Jarman's house in with his father.

Herman Dane has again moved to D. N. Gregory's place.

The services by the children's mission band at the Congregational church at Ironton, Sunday evening, were very nicely conducted.

E. G. Jarman writes that he got his foot very badly hurt one day last week, while at work cutting ice for the Nickerbocker ice company at Harbor Springs.

The ice on Pine Lake was never better for travel than at the present time.

The election for Eveline township has been appointed at the house now occupied by David Snyder, known as the Richard Lake house. The reason for making this change is that ever since the school house in district No. 3 has been built the electors have been held there; the township board have allowed the district $10.00, which the present school board does not consider enough. The cost of cleaning is $3.00, the rough usage, the moving and replacing of the patent seats, the breakage, etc., the $10 would not cover. The district offered it for $15.00, but as the town board refused to pay it a new place was appointed. The coming election will, according to the new law, have to determine on a permanent place to hold elections. Let us build a town hall.

The following are the caucus nominations: For supervisor, Ava Smith; clerk, Robert A. Miller; treasurer, S. R. Brown; highway commissioner, James F. Mitchell; justice of the peace, G. E. Rogers; school inspector, John Dunlop; member of board of review, two years, John Coblentz; one year, David R. Lane; constables, John Stewart, James Alexander, W. H. Jarman, J. F. King.

☞Patronize home industry. Use Hifenbury Milling Co's. flour. Iron Duke is the best in the market.

Boyne City.

MARCH 25—Rain and snow is the order of the weather to-day.

At the school building on Friday evening next there will be an exhibition given by the school. An elaborate program has been prepared and an enjoyable is anticipated.

J. C. Schaub is laying a new floor in his meat market.

Old Mr. Helfrich who has been quite ill for some time is somewhat improved at this writing.

H C. Sergent has been confined to the house with chronic trouble for some time and has been a great sufferer.

Judge Kent was in town last Friday.

Miss. Attie Crane of Hortons is in town.

Mrs. N. J. DeBar is quite ill with the grippe.

Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham were surprised one evening last week by their residence being entered and taken possession of by a number of their freinds who treated the family and themselves to warm sugar. A very enjoyable evening was spent.

Miss Alice Reed of East Jordan made Mrs. A. E. Martin a pleasant call on Friday afternoon.

Our local politicians have been quite busy lately.

Mrs. Vine Crane spent a couple of days at East Jordan last week a guest of her brother C. G. Lewis.

Mr. and Mrs. David Grossfost Sundayed with C. Smith, brother of the latter.

Pleasant Valley.

MARCH 25—Silas Demming has so far recovered from the accidental injuries received in Beech's lumber camp as to be able to resume work.

Mrs. Silas Deming is quite sick.

Latest victims of la grippe—Mrs. Van Newville, Bernice Newville, Grace Newvile, and Johny Newville.

Sleighing has gone and Beech's lumber camp has "folded its tents like the Arab" and left the country. David Kuhns has taken the contract of hauling what few logs were left in the woods.

Palmer Chase, Silas Deming, and Fred Newville are getting out ties for Van Newville.

Mr. King of Advance was in town to-day. It is rumored that he is negotiating for a farm in this vicinity and may become a resident of Pleasant Valley.

Noble and Neigle Burdick have accepted an invitation to help with their violins to furnish music for the Boyne City school entertainment on Friday evening, the 28th inst. They played for the S. of V. party at Steel's hall in Advance the 14th inst.

The identity of the Wilson correspondent has been a subject of wondorment. It is plainly a woman however, for she gets the traditional last word.

Burgess.

MARCH 25.—A democratic caucus for the purpose of selecting candidates for the various township offices of the township of Hayes will be held in the afternoon on the 29th of March, at the Murray school house at 1 o'clock A. D. 1890, by order democratic township committee.

Flickenger a former resident of Hayes, soon starts for Minnesota where he intends to locate and purchase a farm. His many friends wish him the best of luck.

Mrs. Edna Kane is spending the week in caring for the sick at the home of her brother, Morrel Long.

A young son arrived at the home of Morrel Long on Sunday.

Mrs. and Mrs. Isaac West of Bay were visiting friends in Hayes on Sunday.

Henry Hamlin has returned to his own place to live again.

Dr. Ferguson is still in Charlevoix under the care of physicians.

Rev. Mr. Moody preached his farewell sermon at Burgess School house last Sunday evening to a full house. He has too many other appointments to be able to keep up his meetings there.

Atwood.

MARCH 26.—Sugar making has begun.

Born, to Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Seymour, last Thursday, a daughter.

Sim Blow has engaged with Owen Wood for all summer.

Albert Superneau is working for Guyles & Nash at Norwood helping to repair the saw mill.

Adolphus Superneau has moved back on his place.

Mrs. Connor bought a horse of A. R. Richards of Charlevoix last week.

A. E. Batchelder of Torch Lake is visiting friends here this week.

☞Those who intend to pay for the JOURNAL with block-wood must get a hustle on themselves and bring it before the snows gone.

Wilson.

Cloudy and warm.

Afton school reports: Enrolled 26; average attendance 18, during term.

Nelson and Libbie Wilks of Jordan township attended the spelling match on Thursday evening.

Mr. Cooper of Charlevoix visited his son, and daughter, Mrs. Sherman, several days last week.

Harvey Avery, of the Branch Crookes Saw Co., of St. Louis, Mo., called at the mill on Thursday last.

The spelling-match was not as well attended as was expected as it was a rainy time. Miss Prudence Scofield won the victory.

School closed on Friday afternoon with review and short recitations by the pupils. Seventeen visitors were present. Miss Katie Wilson is much respected by all and has been engaged for the summer term.

Manuel Wilson of Banks, brother of the teacher, visited the school and took Miss Katie back with him.

Several loads of people from Jordan and Wilson townships attended the funeral of Mrs. Adaline Warner at the M. E. church in East Jordan on Wednesday last. The services were conducted by Elder Gulick. The text was Ps. 23-4, which was her selection.

Inwood.

MARCH 26.—Albert O'Brian's wife has been very sick.

Edwin Cook filled his ice house last week.

Potoskey butchers have been through this vicinity looking for fat cattle and sent milch cows.

McGeagh still grinds feed every Saturday.

Geo. Miller moved back to Marion last week.

A cutter and young lady were capsized in Norwood the other day, but no serious injury done.

A large quantity of Avery peas will be sowed in Norwood and Banks this spring.

The social at the Hilton school house last Friday night for the benefit of Elder Hayne was well attended. Receipts, $18.35.

Recent Saving of Life in Michigan

In a carefully prepared paper, read before the Sanitary Convention at Vicksburg, the proceedings of which are just published, Dr. Baker gives official statistics and evidence which is summarized as follows:

"The record of the great saving of human life and health in Michigan in recent years is, one to which, it seems to me, the state and local boards of health can justly 'point with pride.' It is a record of the saving of over one hundred lives per year from small pox, four hundred lives per year saved from death by scarlet fever, and nearly six hundred lives per year saved from death by diphtheria—an aggregate of eleven hundred lives per year, or three lives per day saved from these three diseases! This is a record which we ask to have examined, and which we are willing to have compared with that of the man who 'made two blades of grass grow where only one grew before.'"

500 Children Will Sing

on the afternoon and evening of the opening day (April 22) of the Detroit Floral and Musical Charity Festival. These children are being trained by Mrs. Emma A. Thomas, director of vocal music in the Detroit public schools. The songs will be from popular operas, and the national airs of various countries. "Columbia" will be the opening number, and will be accompanied by the waving of 500 little flags, and "everybody" will have an opportunity to hear the children sing.

Godey's for April.

To estimate fully the value of Godey's Lady's Book is a difficult task; the Easter number is a real gem. Beautiful illustrations, exquisite fashions and good literature, fill its pages; besides which, each reader is entitled to the choice of a cut paper pattern. All this is given for only $2.00 a year. Godey Publishing Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Since congress assembled in December three bills against trusts have been introduced in the senate and fifteen in the house. The most important of these is the bill of Senator Sherman. The senator was quoted some time ago as saying that the tariff protection should be withdrawn in cases where trusts or combinations are formed to limit production, but his bill does not embrace that very wise feature. Why does he not hit the trusts at their most vital spot?

The condition of the woolen manufacturing industry of Philadelphia is reported to be alarming. Over 800 weavers are idle; two large mills, employing together 1,500 hands, have shut down; and another large establishment, which has been running night and day for several years, is now on half time.

A HAUNTED ROOM.

In the dim chamber whence but yesterday
Passed my beloved, filled with awe I stand;
And haunting forms fashioning on every hand
Whisper her praises who is far away.
A thousand delicate fancies chance and play
On every object which her robes have fanned,
And fostered thoughts and hopes bloom and expand
In the sweet memory of her beauty's ray.
Ah! could that glass but hold the fairest trace
Of all the loveliness once mirrored there,
The chastening glory of this shadowy day
That framed so well the dear young angel face!
But no, it shows my own face, full of care,
And my heart is her beauty's dwelling place.
—John Hay in Scribner's.

AN IRON DEVIL.

An Especially Murderous Locomotive on the East Tennessee Railroad.

There is a particularly vicious engine on the East Tennessee road.

It has killed twenty-seven men, and engineers and firemen feel a superstitious dread whenever they have to take a run on the rails with this man killer.

"I sometimes feel," said a grizzled old stoker a few days ago, "that there is a murderous spirit in that engine. She killed two men before she got on the rails. While she was being steamed up in the shops a plug blew out, and two mechanics were scalded to death. Then it was brought south and sent out on its first run. She mounted the rails and plunged down an embankment, killing her engineer and fireman.

"Soon afterwards she was fixed up and put on the road again. She ran for a while all right, and one night the engineer that was driving her saw a headlight bearing down on him and tried to reverse the lever and run back; but the engine acted like a mule and wouldn't answer her throttle. She went whirling on and crashed into the other train. Five men were killed in the two engine boxes.

"But I can't remember half the devilry she did. Once she seemed to get into the dumps while on the road and just wouldn't be managed. She acted as if the devil was in her cylinders. Whenever the engineer pulled open the throttle she would storm down the track like a hell cat, and it was like stopping a bucking bronco to get her down to a quiet pace.

"An emigrant train was running ahead, and the engineer of the main killer had orders to look out for it. After a run of an hour or so he came in sight of the emigrant train as it rumbled along up a heavy grade; then it disappeared over the crest and this devil of an engine went charging up and over about a minute behind. The engineer expected to see the horse load jumpy when he saw how they had slowed up and were only a few hundred yards ahead. Down went the engine bellowing like mad, and as soon as the emigrants heard it, out they steamed as fast as they could. But the old hell cat could outrun them. She ran down on them like a tornado and smashed their horse load into kindling wood, killing a grizzled old stoker and fireman.

"Now, I'm a man of my word, and I'll stake my two fingers against two of your toes that I am not in receipt of letters, asking me to recommend some complete fool as a competitor of pimples, and requesting to be told if arsenic is as safe for an internal medicine as it is for a complexion wash. These correspondents know that arsenic is a deadly poison, and they talk about its use as if it were the simplest and safest drug in the world. Arsenical doses will put an end to pimples, and, what is more, they will put the life of the person using them.—Eleanor Kirk in Atlanta Constitution.

A Magnificent Water Plant.

The leaves of the Victoria regina attain a diameter of six feet. They are circular, with a raised rim like the rim of a shallow tin pan. The largest flowers are twenty-three inches across. They are white, with a yellow center, and exhale a wonderful perfume. The stems and leaves shoot out twenty feet from the plant. A board has been placed on one of the floating leaves, and a child 6 years of age has been contained upon the board. —Pittsburg Dispatch.

Should He Well Cared For.

Baboony—Aw, that's awful! The player of a man smoking a pipe with a silk hat on the street!

Wiggins—That's so, Algy. Pipes with silk hats ought to be carefully preserved in museums.—Texas Siftings.

English Fraud Coffee.

English tea is delicious, but their coffee is abominable. The ready ground coffee sold in the shops is as fine as dust. If you ask the grocer to grind it coarse he will have it like a piece of granulated sugar. It is only possible to have it drinkable by making in a French coffee pot by percolation. Made in the American way, by boiling, it requires exaggerated care or it is like mud.—London Letter.

MILK TICKETS, with black space for name, 25 cents for 50; 40 cents per 100. Prices printed to order on short notice, at this office.

The Use of Arsenic.

A woman of ordinary intelligence ought to know without being told that arsenic is a poisonous substance, dangerous to the health, and yet not a week passes that I am not in receipt of letters, asking me to recommend some complete fool as a competitor of pimples, and requesting to be told if arsenic is as safe for an internal medicine as it is for a complexion wash. These correspondents know that arsenic is a deadly poison, and they talk about its use as if it were the simplest and safest drug in the world. Arsenical doses will put an end to pimples, and, what is more, they will put the life of the person using them.—Eleanor Kirk in Atlanta Constitution.

Crossing will be attempted this week with a horse, in order to take back the remaining mail, as the whole could not be drawn at one load. The ducks came as far as Gray's Reef, on ice nine inches in thickness.—Cross Village Correspondence Petoskey Democrat.

"Deestrick Skoolie" Entertainment.

The "Deestrick Skoolie" entertainment last Friday evening was greatly enjoyed by a full house. The audience enjoyed themselves very much, and the players too, if judged by the playful antics indulged in by the "scholars of forty years ago." Many jokes were cracked and some hits made, though some of the jokes were as old-fashioned as the "skule." Much laughter was provoked by the novel costumes worn by the actors. The net receipts were about $80 which was divided between the Methodist and Congregational churches.

Real Estate Deals.

The Enterprise Railroad.

The East Jordan Enterprise took the cross editions last week to express the hope that they would have a railroad in the near future and that Charlevoix would have none at all.

We recollect several noisy so-called railroad surveys that have been made in that portion of the county in recent years, each for some specific purpose other than an actual railroad. This is very likely the same. The people were deceived before; are they not now?

Meantime Charlevoix has one survey which is sure to become a railroad. Another survey is quietly but actually progressing—not on paper only, but by a gang of active men employed by a substantial, progressive railroad company.

This survey is not for bluff, but business, and when the work is complete the people will find that the cars will run into Charlevoix instead of over the hills east of Pine Lake.

Business men and investors should remember this, and pay no heed to the frothings of our contemporaries up the lake.

Fire Losses Adjusted.

We take pleasure in saying that the loss on our stock of dry goods, etc., occasioned by the fire on the 13th inst. has been adjusted to our entire satisfaction, and the cash was paid just one week from the date of the fire.

Our insurance was placed in the following companies, viz.: The Northern of England, the Niagara of New York, the Connecticut of Hartford, from the agency of R. W. Kane; and the Firemen's Fund and the Continental of New York, from the agency of H. S. Harsha.

Card of Thanks.

The Congregational and M. E. societies wish in this public way to extend their sincere thanks to Dr. Lewis for the free use of his Opera House.

Also to Hon. Wm Harris for helping so much gratuitously.

We wish to thank all who in any way contributed to the success of the entertainment.

COMMITTEE.

Norwood Township Caucus.

There will be a caucus for the purpose of nominating township officers at the township year, held at the town hall in the village of Norwood, on Tuesday, April 1st, at 8 o'clock p. m. Town board will meet at 10 a. m. of same day to settle with the treasurer.

WILLIAM HARRIS.

A Human Stone Eater.

At Antepon, France, in 1760, a human stone eater was on exhibition for some time. He was not a "freak" or "fakir," but a real will machine of stones, found on an island between Iceland and the Swedish coast. He not only swallowed them an inch or more in length, but reduced marbles, small pebbles and other rocks to a powder with his powerful teeth. Royal society physicians examined him and found his gullet very large and his stomach large and roomy, also. He would eat raw flesh with the stones, but could not be prevailed upon to swallow bread or other victuals. He would drink water, but much preferred brandy, and while under the influence of the liquor required twice his usual amount of stony food. When not eating or sleeping he smoked continually, sitting with one leg over the other, giving no heed to those crowding around him. The flints he swallowed were, when boiled, corroded and much diminished in weight, the rest of the excrement resembling pure mortar. He never learned to pronounce but a few words and soon died.—St. Louis Republic.

"For Rent."

Says a La Salle street agent: "I am going to make an innovation which I think renters will appreciate. I am going to have all the houses and flats for which I am agent photographed. These photographs will be in my office. They will give the applicant some idea of an idea of the premises before he goes to the trouble of an investigation. Wherever I have a house or flat for rent I will arrange to have the key to the premises convenient and will pay the man who keeps the key a percentage of the commission rent to answer all questions regarding the premises. A man who runs a house to live in has some rights. The time is about at hand when the unaccommodating landlord who cares for nothing but his rental will have to adopt some other business. The old fashioned house and that most give way pretty much to the new ideas in the way of modern improvements for the old style houses."—Chicago Tribune.

Growing as a Farmer.

When Mr. Greeley lived at Chappaqua he wrote his celebrated book on farming. It insisted that his friend Jones should purchase a farm adjacent to his own. When he had caused picturing the delights and advantages of such a residence, Mr. Jones asked him what he had raised that year.

"Well," said Mr. Greeley, "I had a good crop of hay."

"That is encouraging," said Mr. Jones. "I suppose you realized a profit from it."

"Not a great profit," was the answer. "You see I had the hay cured and got it into the barn all right before the rain came, but that did not save it."

"How was that?"

"There wasn't any roof on the barn!"—Hoyer's Weekly.

MEMORY OF SNAKES.

The Shining Stone Which the Cobra Carries to Attract Fireflies.

The cobras are perhaps the only serpents which will eat insects. They feed on ants, grasshoppers, a variety of beetles, etc., but seem to have a special preference for fireflies, perhaps because the latter can be caught at night much more easily than any other kind of insect. I have often for hours watched cobras in the grass catching the fireflies, darting about here and there, a process which requires considerable exertion on the part of the serpent. Now, every entomologist knows that the flying lampyrids consists entirely of males. The females, which are not very numerous, are much larger and cannot fly, as they have only rudimentary wings. They sit quietly in the grass, emitting a greenish light, which is much stronger than that of the males, and fades and becomes brilliant at regular intervals. If a glowworm be watched for a time, a steady current of male insects will be observed flying towards it and alighting in close proximity.

Now it so happens that the naja-kalin, this little pebble of chlorophane or fluor-spar, emits in the dark a greenish light, which is so much like that of the female lampyris that it is an easy matter to deceive the male firefly with it by setting it up as a decoy. The cobras have gradually come to take advantage of an experience made by them, accidentally, I dare say, thousands of years ago. It may frequently happen, for instance, that a cobra finds one of these shining stones in the gravel of dry river beds (where they are by no means uncommon), being attracted to it by its glow at night, and taking it for a glowworm. It would, then, at any rate, notice that the fireflies could be caught much more easily and quickly in the neighborhood of that shining object than anywhere else, and would habitually return to it. Several cobras might thus come together, and there would be competition, and from this moment to the finding out that success in capturing fireflies depends on the possession of this phosphorescent pebble, and to the training of it in order to prevent another snake monopolizing it, is, in my opinion, no great step, and involves no exceptional powers of reasoning. The cobra carries it about, and soon learns to treasure it, for it affords it an easy means of getting its living. All it has to do is to deposit the stone in the grass at night, and the obliging insects literally fly down its throat.

There are even reasons for believing that no individual experience is now necessary to cause any cobra to act in this manner, but that even a young cobra, on finding such a stone, will instinctively take it up and use it in the manner I have described. For it must be borne in mind that there is an inherited race memory among the lower animals which is often far stronger than the memory gathered during the short life time of the individual. What causes a blind kitten to spit and put up its back if a dog is brought near it? It never saw a dog, never saw anything, yet it knows there is some danger ahead. Thus the accumulated experience of the cobra's ancestors during countless generations now causes it to act in a manner which we refer to instinct.

Such are the remarkable facts connected with the naja-kalin, the cobra's shining stone. Who can tell whether the old traditions of snakes carrying precious stones, of which we still find traces in our fairy tales, may not have their source in some such fact as this?—Professor H. Hensoldt in Harper's.

Improved Dumbbell.

In athletic exercise, which now plays such a prominent part in hygienic culture, the old notion of severe laborious exertion, to the extent that it becomes exploded, and modern science has decided that light and very gradually increasing tasks are productive of the best and most lasting results. In dumbbells of the usual construction the athlete must have a large assortment of gradually increasing sizes, and unless a great many are kept the transition to a heavier pair cannot be made in the moderate graduation that is advisable. To meet this contingency an improved dumbbell has been devised. It consists of two hollow wooden shells through which the handle passes. These balls can be the receivers of a large or small quantity of sand or shot as may be desired, and thus the weight of the dumbbell can be graduated with the greatest nicety.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The Cotton in the Air.

The players form a ring and join hands. A small bit of jewelry cotton or a light feather is then thrown into the air, and they try, by blowing it upward, to keep it from falling. If they blow too hard, the cotton is driven away; if too gently, it falls, and the game is finished. The interest consists in directing it, if possible, to one or other of the players, who pays a forfeit if it falls before her. All this must be done without letting go of hands. The game may also be played sitting round a table.—Ladies' Home Journal.

No Excursions in Cuba.

A friend of mine, intending a party over Cuba, applied to one of the railways for a dozen tickets. He was told that as a special favor he would be given the tickets at regular tariff rates—"but," continued the officer, "thereafter when you want to make the trip we shall have to charge you extra rates when you bring a party."

"Why so?" demanded my friend.

"Because," explained the officer, "as large a party necessitates our putting on another car."—Eugene Field in Chicago News.

Good Rates for Advertising.

A single page of a single issue of the Century taken for advertising costs $600, Harper's $400 and other magazines from $350 and $190. A yearly advertisement of one column in the Chicago Tribune costs $29,554 for the lowest and 35,950 for the highest rates. The New York Herald charges $36,203 for the lowest and $39,500 for the highest price column. One inch, or ten lines, one time in the Youth's Companion costs $20. These figures will doubtless astonish the man who invested $10 and thinks he is spending too much money in advertising.

Boyne City.

MARCH 25—Rain and snow alternate to-day, promising to be short of an earthquake order of the weather to-day.

At the school buildings he at once set to work to arrange an entertainment for the deception of Mr. Straightway.

On the day before that on which he had promised to meet his intended Tom told his vicar that he was passing the night with a poor old friend, who had just come home from India, in his rooms near Jermyn street. This, it must be said, was perfectly true, and of course Mr. Straightway could offer no valid objection, as Baxter had done all his work for the day. The next day, however, Tom slunk off to a telegraph office and in guilty haste dispatched a wire to the effect that he was suffering from a severe attack of lumbago, but would, if possible, return in the evening.

By 11 o'clock he was at Lord's. The mere sight of the ground was so welcome to him that he was determined to spend as much time there as he possibly could. He knew, of course, that he would be certain to meet any number of his old friends, and that the whole proceeding was extremely risky; but he consoled himself with the thought that, as Mr. Straightway rarely, if ever, went into society of any sort, he was not at all likely to hear anything about it. So he ensconced himself in the pavilion and awaited the beginning of the play with pleasurable impatience. The Heathcotes were all enthusiastic cricketers, and he counted on their appearance by 12 o'clock at the latest.

The match commenced in due course, but upon its varying fortunes it is not necessary to dwell. The Heathcotes also arrived, and Tom at once took up a position on the drag by the side of Miss Alice, the warmth of whose greeting speedily banished all fears and qualms of conscience from his breast. Nothing, in fact, could have been more perfect than Mr. Baxter's happiness up to the luncheon interval. His stentorian "well hit" or "well bowled" could be heard a hundred yards away; he clapped his hands, stamped and waved his hat like the veriest schoolboy, and meanwhile he was unremitting in his attention to the girl of his heart. Two o'clock struck. The bell rang for lunch, and the occupants of Mr. Heathcote's drag prepared for the substantial meal which forms so prominent a feature of the two great matches at Lord's. Tom by no means despised creature comforts. Mr. Straightway's curates were expected, at all events when with him and on duty, to follow their vicar's example in asceticism, so a good lunch was very acceptable to him. He had supplied Alice's wants, and was in the act of lifting to his mouth a piece of salmon, when suddenly he turned pale, his jaw fell, his eyes dilated, and the piece of salmon, accompanied by the fork, fell unheeded to the ground.

It was too true. Beside the very next drag, talking to a gentleman on the box seat, stood a tall, lean man, in clerical attire, whose figure was horribly familiar to the guilty curate. He could not be mistaken, it was Mr. Septimus Straightway, though what could have brought the reverend gentleman to Lord's was beyond Tom's imagination. The vicar had his back turned, and evidently did not suspect his curate's proximity. Instant flight was the only hope.

"Good gracious, Tom!" cried Miss Alice, "what on earth is the matter? You look as white as a sheet!"

"I don't feel very well, dear. Excuse me one minute," stammered Mr. Baxter. And he rose hurriedly, upsetting his plate, and jumped to the ground. Just as he reached terra firma he saw the clergyman shaking hands with his friend on the box seat; he was turning toward Mr. Heathcote's drag; in another second detection would follow. Tom glanced hurriedly round; the door of the drag was open and no one was looking. He accordingly plunged in headforemost, shut the door, and to make assurance doubly sure, pulled up the wooden blind.

Then he breathed more freely. But what on earth would the Heathcotes think? A confederate was absolutely necessary. The Heathcotes' family butler, Mr. Binns, was an old friend of Tom's, and might be relied upon. Baxter espied Binns opening a bottle of champagne, and attracted his attention as noiselessly as possible.

"Binns!" he whispered, in great agitation, "please say to Miss Alice that I am not well, and that I have gone to take a walk, to bathe my head—say anything, Binns—but for mercy's sake don't let her know that I'm in here. Don't let anybody know. You won't, will you?" he continued, piteously.

Mr. Binns thought that Tom was off his head, but his impassive face betrayed no surprise.

"Certainly, sir. Any other message?"

"No! that will do—and, Binns, come back here at once; I want you to do something else."

"Yessir."

The message caused some little surprise and much sympathy.

"Poor fellow!" said Miss Alice; "it all comes from working so hard in those terrible slums, and never taking a holiday."

When Binns returned Tom asked him in the same agitated whisper:

"Did you notice a tall, thin gentleman—a clergyman—standing beside the next drag just now?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you see him now?"

"Yes, sir," said Binns; also whispering, "he's standing close by."

"Good gracious!" murmured Tom. "Look here, come and tell me when he's gone."

And Tom pulled up the other wooden blind half way, and cowered on the floor among the cushions and dust cloaks. It was terribly hot and stuffy, but he dared not move until Binns returned, and that personage was absent for no less than half an hour by Tom's watch. The captive was growing desperate, when at last a welcome face appeared at the window above the blind.

"Mr. Baxter, sir," whispered Binns, "the clerical gent, sir; he's on the roof of one drag."

"You didn't say so!" groaned Tom.

"He is, indeed, sir. He and my master seems very thick; they're talkin' about school and cay for school."

"He is now on half time.

"I see it now. Old Septimus was at Cambridge, so was Heathcote; they are old friends. How in the name of providence am I to get out of this? I say, Binns, do you know how long stop here I'll be goes. You will keep it dark—now won't you?"

"Most certainly, sir," said the sympathetic butler. "Won't you have some lunch, sir? Nobody will know."

Tom smiled in his misery at the idea. After all, why shouldn't he?

"Well, Binns, I really think I will."

And the trusty servitor disappeared to return with a large platful of cold pie, a bottle of champagne and some strawberries.

"Thank ye, Binns," said Tom, gratefully; "now go away and don't come back till the clergyman has gone. Whew! How hot it is!"

It was hot and no mistake. On a scorching day the interior of a drag with the windows shut is about as agreeable a resting place as the Black Hole. Tom could not let the blinds down, so he drank a tumbler of iced champagne, which made him much warmer than before, though it inspired him to smile at his position. His stiff collar was growing limp, and his heavy black garments began to grow insupportable.

"Wonder if I dare to take my coat off?" he asked himself. The mental answer was "Yes," and he proceeded to do so. Then he felt better, finished the pâté of pie, and had another tumbler of the champagne. "I feel half inclined to go out and face him," reflected Tom, but his heart failed. He piled the dust cloaks, coats and umbrellas in one corner, and tried to make himself comfortable. Presently, however, the match was resumed, and then his real sufferings began. Tom had never endured such torture. Loud applause frequently broke upon his ears, shouts of "Well hit!" "Well bowled!" "Well caught!" and, sometimes, more maddening even than these sounds, there was a deep hush of suspense in the noisy crowd, or a distinctly audible sigh of relief, which told his practiced ears that some exciting crisis of the game had come or gone.

He vainly peered over the half drawn blind to catch a glimpse of the players he could, however, see nothing but a forest of black hats and variegated sunshades. Binns returned not—Tom dared not quit his hiding place, and despair once more possessed his soul. "Suppose I'm here for the afternoon. Holy Moses, how appallingly hot it is!" (Heat is apt to relax the propriety even of a curate's language.) "Wish I dared to take some more of my clothes off!" And then his eye fell on the champagne bottle, which was nearly half full. "Well, I can have another drink, at all events!" And again his troubles seemed less. He stretched himself out as well as he could, for he was a big man and the space was small, and by degrees he finished the bottle. "If only I had a weed," he reflected; "haven't smoked for months, it seems years."

And growing bold even to recklessness, he hunted in the pockets of the other men's overcoats till he found a cigar case. When he had lit a cigar he felt comparatively at ease. It was very hot, he thought, but a peaceful feeling stole over him; the hum of the crowd grew fainter and fainter; the shouts of applause more distant; even the hammering of sticks and umbrellas on the drag, within six inches of his head, ceased to annoy him. He pulled at his cigar less energetically; soon it fell from his lips, and the Rev. Thomas Baxter slept as peacefully as a child.

He was awakened by a rough shake and shout in his ear of "Hi, wake up!" Returning to semi-consciousness he indistinctly heard exclamations of "Shameful!" "Disgusting!" "Who would have thought it?" And then a familiar voice said in somewhat quavering accents, "Leave him to me, paps. I must see him alone." Tom pulled himself together with a jerk, opened his heavy eyes, and found himself confronted by Miss Alice Heathcote, who stood with flushed cheeks and indignant expression at the door of the drag.

"Are you awake, sir?" she inquired, with elaborate sternness.

"Awake! yes; why not, dear?" stammered Mr. Baxter.

"Then what is the meaning of this? You leave me hours ago and say you don't feel well, and here I find you sound asleep when the play is over for the day, and we have been sending all over the ground for you. And in your shirt sleeves, too!"

"Good gracious! I beg your pardon. I forgot." And, blushing scarlet, the curate huddled on his coat.

"And they all say that you are drunk," she continued, with a half sob. "Oh, Tom, it's shameful!"

"Drunk!" cried Mr. Baxter, indignantly. "I should like to meet anybody who says that I'm drunk! Let me explain, darling. I'll come out now." And then he caught sight of his vicar again and shrank back. "Is that man never going?"

"What man?" asked Miss Alice, with impatience. "Really, Tom, you must be mad today."

"Why, the clergyman, Alice, dear; do you know who he is?"

"Of course I do; it's Mr. Grayson, a vicar somewhere in Yorkshire, an old college friend of papa's; they haven't met for twenty years. I'm sure he's not an alarming person—in fact, the only strange thing about him is that about twenty people have mistaken him for your man—Mr. Straightway, you know. Are they at all alike?"

"Yes, they are—rather," gasped Tom, scarcely knowing whether he stood on his head or heels. "Come and Introduce him to me, darling. I'll make it all right with your father."

And he did; but it will be some time before he forgets the last of that cricket match.—Gen man.

A BROKEN HEARTED B'AR.

TRUE STORY OF THE DEMISE OF JASPER GRINDLEY'S PETS.

A Joke with a Water Barrel Brought Retaliation with a Dutch Oven and Led to Premeditated Suicide by Drowning—The Accounts Differ Slightly.

According to the story current among the laymen of this pleasant region, a year-old bear belonging to Jasper Grindley, a bear killer, had a fight with another year-old bear, also the property of Jasper, the result of which fight was the death of the last mentioned bear. The victor made a break for the woods, and, in taking a short cut, attempted to cross Gravely's mill pond on the ice. The ice was too thin to support the weight of the fleeing bear and broke beneath him. He disappeared beneath the ice, and was not seen again until his dead body was carried down by the water to the tail race, and so on to the water wheel of the sawmill. There it became jammed in the paddles and stopped the mill. When the body of the unfortunate bear was removed from the water wheel it was in bad shape.

Such was the story that was current about the death of Jasper Grindley's two bears; and it was tragic enough until Jasper came to with his account of the affair.

DUCKED HIS MATE.

"Then two young b'ars," said Jasper, "beat all creation for smartness, an' it was just that smartness of their's that done 'em both up. They was always playin' tricks on one another, an' one day one o' 'em was takin' a leetle tramp around the house. He come to a barr'l that stood at one corner o' the house, half full o' rain water. He didn't know what was in the barr'l, o' course, but thinkin' that mebbe there was sumpin' in it that mout pan out a heap o' fun for him, he rip up on his hind feet, an' put tin' hif forepaws on top o' the barr'l, looked over into it. Not bein' anything but water in the barr'l, the chances is that the little critter hadn't got down agin an' gone on lookin' for sumpin' else to git fun on of; but, as it is, he up upon the barr'l, sooner 'n he happened round that way. He seen this mate swim' inter the barr'l, an' at first wouldn't it struck him that he sees some fun in the situation. So what does he do but sneak up behind t'other b'ar an' grab him by the hind legs, an' quicker than I kin tell ye he lifted him up an' soused him head first in the barr'l. While the unfortunate b'ar in the barr'l was sputterin' an' splashin' an' twistin' an' clookin' in the water, the tricky little varmint kind danced 'roun' just danced an' jes' cut around, an' hollered till you'd think thort he'd be busted, the thing an' him cut up so powerful funny. The b'ar in the barr'l would' ha' drowned in short order if I hadn't ben clus by, an' run an' turned the barr'l up an' let him out.

A TERRIBLE REVENGE.

"That b'ar never let on that he was put out by the little trick his mate had played on him, an' didn't git mad a bit. But I could see that he was keepin' his eye skinned for a chance to git even. An' there's where I orter kept my eye skinned to prevent anything serious, but I never thort about things ever turnin' out the way they did.

"That big Dutch oven o' mine stands in the back o' the yard jist on a flat, an' my ol' pop built it fifty year ago. The door is allus open except when we're usin' the oven, which hainut more'n wunst a week. One day a couple of weeks ago I noticed that the door was shut, but I didn't think anything wrong till I see that there oven was only one o' the b'ars around, an' he was terrible uneasy, an' kep' hangin' 'round the oven, whimin' an' cryin' as if his heart d'ressed. Then I went and opened the oven door. Inside o' the oven lay t'other b'ar. He was deader'n a mackerel. I pulled him out. He had been suffocated till he died. There was only one way to explain it. The b'ars had been in the habit o' crawlin' in the oven an' lyin' there, one at a time, thinkin' it was bang up fun. Now the b'ar that had been dumped in the barr'l o' water watched his chance, an' when t'other b'ar climb in the oven he just sneaked up an' chapped the door shut on him. I wasn't there to let him out, an' the consequences was that he pegged out sick an' clean.

SELF DESTRUCTION.

From the way the live b'ar acted I know'd that he know'd jist what his trick had ended in, an' he took on orful to see. He howled an' whined an' bellored, an' somehow couldn't git over it. He took to wandrin' over to the neighbors on if he was lookin' for his dead mate, an' they told me that if I didn't keep him hogue he'd git a bullet wunst day. So I put a rope around his neck an' tied t'other end of it to an old plowsheer that was knockin' 'round the yard. He could drag the plowsheer about, but couldn't drag it for. But he kep' up his mournin' for his mate, an' it was tetchin' to see him. I shot, o' course, that he'd git over it bimeby, or I'd ha put him outen his misery.

"One day las' week Sol Tift come to my house an' says:

"'That b'ar o' your'n,' says he, 'is a critter. I jist met hisf walkin' over to'ards the mill pond, carryin' his plowsheer under his arm as handy as I'd carry three pound o' pork.'

"That skeered me. I dog over to'ard the mill pond as fast as I could go. I got there quick enough for I couldn't see nothin' of the b'ar. I walked up around the pond, an' what should I come on to but the b'ar, standin' on the ice an' breakin' a hole through it with the heavy plowsheer. I see what he was up to an' wunst, but afore I could get to him he had the hole made big enough, an' down through he plunked like a minkrat. I waited, but I never see him sg'in. The poor little cuss was jist worn out with remorse for what he had done to his mate an' had committed suicide complete an' deliberate as it had ever been committed since the world started!"—New York Sun.
